LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota was granted leave of absence for six weeks on account of important business.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. KITCHIN. If the gentleman will withhold that——

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman withhold that in order to send a bill to conference?

Mr. STAFFORD. I will be glad to withhold it in order to get a bill to conference.

PENSIONS.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 12229, to disagree to the Senate amendments, and agree to the conference asked.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 12229, to disagree to all Senate amendments, and agree to the conference asked by the Senate. Is there objection? (After a pause.) The Chair hears none.

The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

H. R. 12229. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will announce the conferees.

The Clerk read as follows: Messrs. ASHBROOK, SHOUSE, and LANGLEY.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD a patriotic resolution which I have introduced, and which is House concurrent resolution No. —.

The SPEAKER. But the gentleman from Wisconsin makes the point of order of no quorum.

Mr. LANGLEY. But the gentleman withheld it to enable me to make this request. I was included in his reservation. My resolution reads as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That on this day so sacred in American history, the anniversary of the birth of liberty and of republican government in the western world, while American patriots are fighting and dying to perpetuate the principles then established that governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed, and that government of the people, by the people, for the people shall not perish from the earth; and while Americans, together with the whole civilized world, are suffering unspeakable anguish we, the representatives of a free people, dedicated to the cause of liberty and the freedom and equality of all mankind, do hereby arraign before the bar of history the German Emperor and his associates as the assassins of civilization, feigning partnership with the Deity while they violate every law, both sacred and profane, and preaching peace while preparing for war; that we denounce them as archconspirators against the peace and happiness of the world and responsible for the sacrifice of untold millions of human beings; that we express our devout belief and trust that the Supreme Ruler of the Universe will, in His own time and in His own way, aid us in the destruction of Prussianism and in the restoration of mankind to an abiding and righteous peace—and to the consummation thereof we hereby rededicate our lives, our fortunes, and our sacred honor.

Mr. STAFFORD. I withheld it in order to enable the gentleman from Kentucky, the gentleman from Ohio, and the gentleman from North Carolina to make requests for unanimous consent.

THE DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a document by one T. Jefferson, entitled "The Declaration of Independence."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a document written by Thomas Jefferson, entitled "The Declaration of American Independence." Is there objection? (After a pause.) The Chair hears none.

DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE.

In Congress July 4, 1776.

The unanimous declaration of the thirteen United States of America. When in the course of human events, it becomes necessary for one people to dissolve the political bands which have connected them with another, and to assume among the powers of the earth, the separate and equal station to which the laws of Nature and of Nature's God entitle them, a decent respect to the opinions of mankind requires that they should declare the causes which impel them to the separation.

We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal, that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable rights, that among these are life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness. That to secure these rights, governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed, that whenever any form of government becomes destructive of these ends, it is the right of the people to alter or to abolish it, and to institute new government, laying its foundation on such principles and organizing its powers in such form as to them shall seem most likely to effect their safety and happiness. Prudence, indeed, will dictate that governments long established should not be changed for light and transient causes; and accordingly all experience hath shown, that mankind are more disposed to suffer, while evils are sufferable, than to right themselves by abolishing the forms to which they are accustomed. But when a long train of abuses and usurpations, pursuing invariably the same object, evinces a design to reduce them under absolute despotism, it is their right, it is their duty, to throw off such government, and to provide new guards for their future security. Such has been the patient sufferance of these Colonies; and such is now the necessity which constrains them to alter their former systems of government. The history of the present King of Great Britain is a history of repeated injuries and usurpations, all having in direct object the establishment of an absolute tyranny over these States. To prove this, let facts be submitted to a candid world.

He has refused his assent to laws, the most wholesome and necessary for the public good.

He has forbidden his governors to pass laws of immediate and pressing importance, unless suspended in their operation till his assent should be obtained; and when so suspended, he has utterly neglected to attend to them.

He has refused to pass other laws for the accommodation of large districts of people, unless those people would relinquish the right of representation in the legislature, a right inestimable to them, and formidable to tyrants only.

He has called together legislative bodies at places unusual, uncomfortable, and distant from the depository of their public records, for the sole purpose of fatiguing them into compliance with his measures.

He has dissolved representative houses repeatedly, for opposing with manly firmness his invasions on the rights of the people.

He has refused for a long time, after such dissolutions, to cause others to be elected; whereby the legislative powers, incapable of annihilation, have returned to the people at large for their exercise; the State remaining in the meantime exposed to all the dangers of invasion from without, and convulsions within.

He has endeavored to prevent the population of these States; for that purpose obstructing the laws for naturalization of foreigners; refusing to pass others to encourage their migrations hither, and raising the conditions of new appropriations of lands.

He has obstructed the administration of justice, by refusing his assent to laws for establishing judiciary powers.

He has made judges dependent on his will alone, for the tenure of their offices, and the amount and payment of their salaries.

He has erected a multitude of new offices, and sent hither swarms of officers to harass our people, and eat out their substance.

He has kept among us, in times of peace, standing armies without the consent of our legislature.

He has affected to render the military independent of and superior to the civil power.

He has combined with others to subject us to a jurisdiction foreign to our constitution, and unacknowledged by our laws; giving his assent to their acts of pretended legislation:

For quartering large bodies of armed troops among us:

For protecting them, by a mock trial, from punishment for any murders which they should commit on the inhabitants of these States:

For cutting off our trade with all parts of the world:

For imposing taxes on us without our consent:

For depriving us in many cases, of the benefits of trial by jury:

For transporting us beyond seas to be tried for pretended offenses:

For abolishing the free system of English laws in a neighboring province, establishing therein an arbitrary government, and enlarging its boundaries so as to render it at once an example and fit instrument for introducing the same absolute rule into these colonies:

For taking away our charters, abolishing our most valuable laws, and altering fundamentally the forms of our governments:

For suspending our own legislatures, and declaring themselves invested with power to legislate for us in all cases whatsoever.

He has abdicated government here, by declaring us out of his protection and waging war against us.

He has plundered our seas, ravaged our coasts, burnt our towns, and destroyed the lives of our people.

He is at this time transporting large armies of foreign mercenaries to complete the works of death, desolation and tyranny, already begun with circumstances of cruelty and perfidy, scarcely paralleled in the most barbarous ages, and totally unworthy the head of a civilized nation.

He has constrained our fellow-citizens, taken captive on the high seas to bear arms against their country, to become the executioners of their friends and brethren, or to fall themselves by their hands.

He has excited domestic insurrection amongst us, and has endeavored to bring on the inhabitants of our frontiers the merciless Indian savages, whose known rule of warfare is an undistinguished destruction of all ages, sexes, and conditions.

In every stage of these oppressions, we have petitioned for redress in the most humble terms; our repeated petitions have been answered only by repeated injury. A prince, whose character is thus marked by every act which may define a tyrant, is unfit to be the ruler of a free people.

Nor have we been wanting in attentions to our British brethren. We have warned them from time to time of attempts by their legislature to extend an unwarrantable jurisdiction over us. We have reminded them of the circumstances of our emigration and settlement here. We have appealed to their native justice and magnanimity, and we have conjured them by the ties of our common kindred to disavow these usurpations, which would inevitably interrupt our connections and correspondence. They, too, have been deaf to the voice of justice and of consanguinity. We must, therefore, acquiesce in the necessity which denounces our separation, and hold them, as we hold the rest of mankind, enemies in war, in peace friends.

We, therefore, the representatives of the United States of America, in general Congress, assembled, appealing to the Supreme Judge of the world for the rectitude of our intentions, do, in the name, and by authority of the good people of these Colonies, solemnly publish and declare, that these United Colonies are, and of right ought to be, FREE AND INDEPENDENT STATES; that they are absolved from all allegiance to the British Crown, and that all political connection between them and the State of Great Britain, is and ought to be totally dissolved; and that as free and independent States, they have full power to levy war, conclude peace, contract alliances, establish commerce, and to do all other acts and things which independent States may of right do. And for the support of this Declaration, with a firm reliance on the protection of Divine Providence, we mutually pledge to each other our lives, our fortunes, and our sacred honor.

GENERAL DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATIONS.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin withheld his motion for three specific purposes, and the gentleman from Kentucky is one of them.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to take from the Speaker's table the general deficiency bill (H. R. 12600), to disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 12600, disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference. Is there objection? (After a pause). The Chair hears none. The clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 12600) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, and prior fiscal years, on account of war expenses, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will announce the conferees.

The Clerk read as follows: Mr. SHERLEY, Mr. EAGAN, and Mr. CANNON.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Has a Member the right to make the point of no quorum and then hold it up for a specific purpose?

The SPEAKER. Oh, that has been done thousands of times.

Mr. STAFFORD. And as a free American citizen I also have the privilege of withdrawing it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Declaration of Independence is sufficient for the day.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman make the point?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I reserve it only for a motion by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN].

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania makes the point of no quorum, but reserves it for the benefit of the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 a. m. to-morrow.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I simply want to call attention to the fact that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HELM] who caused this meeting to be held to-day is not here. It seems he was not as much interested in the transaction of public business as he indicated.

The SPEAKER. It is not debatable.

The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 a. m. to-morrow. Is there objection?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I wish to say for quite a while now the subcommittee which was sent to East St. Louis to investigate the riot out there has been ready to report and it has been——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I renew my point of no quorum.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. It is a privileged matter——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania makes the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I want to ask the gentleman if he would not agree that that may come up to-morrow.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I renew the point of no quorum and insist on it. The Declaration of Independence is now in the RECORD.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 12 o'clock and 14 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, July 5, 1918, at 12 o'clock noon.

SENATE.

FRIDAY, July 5, 1918.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, our hearts beat high with hope because we have seen once more the outward and visible expression of a united people battling for the highest and best in national and personal life. We have celebrated the achievements of our fathers, who gave to us a Government pledged to the task of guaranteeing and perpetuating the rights of all men. We feel the courage that comes out of the expression of the unity of our life and faith and the determination of a people that this Government shall not perish from the earth. We pray Thee, O God, to so lead us that we who have received such a rich inheritance of the past may hold it, may glorify it with our lives, and pass it on to future generations. For Christ's sake. Amen.

THE PRESIDENT'S ADDRESS AT MOUNT VERNON (S. DOC. NO. 258).

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, on yesterday, July 4, at the tomb of George Washington, the President of the United States delivered an address in the presence of the representatives of over 30 nations, but submitted in sober truth to the representatives and the peoples of all nations.

It was a glorious declaration of the principles, motives, hopes, and purposes of the American people. It was the voice of the mightiest Republic on earth. It was a call to all men of every nation, of every people, to recognize justice, righteousness, and humanity in the governments of men. It was a blazing light illuminating the straight and simple pathway to human peace, security, and happiness throughout the earth. Every Senator, I am sure, heartily approves the noble principles announced and will be glad to have the address set forth in our permanent records.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have the address printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. PENROSE. What is the request?

Mr. OWEN. To print in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the address made by the President at Mount Vernon yesterday.

Mr. PENROSE. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. OWEN. And I ask that it also be made a public document.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The address is as follows:

ADDRESS OF PRESIDENT WILSON, DELIVERED AT MOUNT VERNON, JULY 4, 1918.

Gentlemen of the Diplomatic Corps and my fellow citizens, I am happy to draw apart with you to this quiet place of old counsel in order to speak a little of the meaning of this day of our Nation's independence. The place seems very still and remote. It is as serene and untouched by the hurry of the world as it was in those great days long ago when Gen. Washington was here and held leisurely conference with the men who were to be associated with him in the creation of a nation. From these gentle slopes they looked out upon the world and saw it whole, saw it with the light of the future upon it, saw it with modern eyes that turned away from a past which men of liberated spirits could no longer endure. It is for that reason that we can not feel, even here, in the immediate presence of this sacred tomb, that this is a place of death. It was a place of achievement. A great promise that was meant for all minkind was here given plan and reality. The associations by which we are here surrounded are the inspiriting associations of that noble death which is only a glorious consummation. From this green hillside we also ought to be able to see with comprehending eyes the world that lies about us and should conceive anew the purposes that must set men free.

It is significant,—significant of their own character and purpose and of the influences they were setting afoot,—that Washington and his associates, like the barons at Runnymede, spoke and acted, not for a class, but for a people. It has been left for us to see to it that it shall be understood that they spoke and acted, not for a single people only, but for all mankind. They were thinking, not of themselves and of the material interests which centered in the little groups of landholders and merchants and men of affairs with whom they were accustomed to act, in Virginia and the colonies to the north and south of her, but of a people which wished to be done with classes and special interests and the authority of men whom they had not themselves chosen to rule over them. They entertained no private purpose, desired no peculiar privilege. They were consciously planning that men of every class should be free and America a place to which men out of every nation might resort who wished to share with them the rights and privileges of free men. And we take our cue from them,—do we not? We intend what they intended. We here in America believe our participation in this present war to be only the fruitage of what they planted. Our case differs from theirs only in this, that it is our inestimable privilege to concert with men out of every nation what shall make not only the liberties of America secure but the liberties of every other people as well. We are happy in the thought that we are permitted to do what they would have done had they been in our place. There must now be settled once for all what was settled for America in the great age upon whose inspiration we draw to-day. This is surely a fitting place from which calmly to look out upon our task, that we may fortify our spirits for its accomplishment. And this is the appropriate place from which to avow, alike to the friends who look on and to the friends with whom we have the happiness to be associated in action, the faith and purpose with which we act.

This, then, is our conception of the great struggle in which we are engaged. The plot is written plain upon every scene and every act of the supreme tragedy. On the one hand stand the peoples of the world,—not only the peoples actually engaged, but many others also who suffer under mastery but can not act; peoples of many races and in every part of the world,—the people of stricken Russia still, among the rest, though they are for the moment unorganized and helpless. Opposed to them, masters of many armies, stand an isolated, friendless group of governments who speak no common purpose but only selfish ambitions of their own by which none can profit but themselves, and whose peoples are fuel in their hands; governments which fear their people and yet are for the time their sovereign lords, making every choice for them and disposing of their lives and fortunes as they will, as well as of the lives and fortunes of every people who fall under their power,—governments clothed with the strange trappings and the primitive authority of an age that is altogether alien and hostile to our own. The Past and the Present are in deadly grapple and the peoples of the world are being done to death between them.

There can be but one issue. The settlement must be final. There can be no compromise. No halfway decision would be tolerable. No halfway decision is conceivable. These are the ends for which the associated peoples of the world are fighting and which must be conceded them before there can be peace:

I. The destruction of every arbitrary power anywhere that can separately, secretly, and of its single choice disturb the peace of the world; or, if it cannot be presently destroyed, at the least its reduction to virtual impotence.

II. The settlement of every question, whether of territory, of sovereignty, of economic arrangement, or of political relationship, upon the basis of the free acceptance of that settlement by the people immediately concerned, and not upon the basis of the material interest or advantage of any other nation or people which may desire a different settlement for the sake of its own exterior influence or mastery.

III. The consent of all nations to be governed in their conduct towards each other by the same principles of honour and of respect for the common law of civilized society that govern the individual citizens of all modern states in their relations with one another, to the end that all promises and covenants may be sacredly observed, no private plots or conspiracies hatched, no selfish injuries wrought with impunity, and a mutual trust established upon the handsome foundation of a mutual respect for right.

IV. The establishment of an organization of peace which shall make it certain that the combined power of free nations will check every invasion of right and serve to make peace and justice the more secure by affording a definite tribunal of opinion to which all must submit and by which every international readjustment that cannot be amicably agreed upon by the peoples directly concerned shall be sanctioned.

These great objects can be put into a single sentence. What we seek is the reign of law, based upon the consent of the governed and sustained by the organized opinion of mankind.

These great ends cannot be achieved by debating and seeking to reconcile and accommodate what statesmen may wish, with their projects for balances of power and of national opportunity. They can be realized only by the determination of what the thinking peoples of the world desire, with their longing hope for justice and for social freedom and opportunity.

I can fancy that the air of this place carries the accents of such principles with a peculiar kindness. Here were started forces which the great nation against which they were primarily directed at first regarded as a revolt against its rightful authority but which it has long since seen to have been a step in the liberation of its own people as well as of the people of the United States; and I stand here now to speak—speak proudly and with confident hope—of the spread of this revolt, this liberation, to the great stage of the world itself! The blinded rulers of Prussia have roused forces they knew little of—forces which, once roused, can never be crushed to earth again; for they have at their heart an inspiration and a purpose which are deathless and of the very stuff of triumph!

CORPORATE EARNINGS AND GOVERNMENT REVENUES (S. DOC. NO. 259).

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate the following communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, which will be read and, with accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed.

The communication is as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, July 5, 1918.

Hon. THOMAS R. MARSHALL,
President of the United States Senate.

MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: I have the honor to refer again to Senate resolution 253, receipt of which was acknowledged by my letter of June 8. The resolution reads as follows:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to furnish the Senate with the following information:

"First. Any and all facts, figures, data, or information now in possession of the Treasury Department relative to profiteering which would in any way enable Congress to deal with the matter either through the present proposed revenue legislation or through enactment of more effective criminal statutes. That such report shall contain a list of all corporations, with the amount of their earnings, which have earned in excess of 15 per cent on their capital stock, as shown by their returns to the Internal-Revenue Bureau for the calendar year 1917, accompanied by such statement as will show net earnings of the same corporation for the calendar year 1916.

"Second. The figures showing the amount of money which the Government has raised up to this time since the beginning of the war by taxation and the amount which it has raised by loans."

The information submitted herewith in response to the first paragraph of the resolution was obtained from the income and excess-profits returns of 31,500 of a total of approximately 55,000 corporations in the United States which, in the calendar year 1917, earned 15 per cent or more on their capital stock. The corporations included in the list are believed to be representative, as some are included from each of the major groups and most of the minor groups, representing the various recognized industries, trades, and occupations, comprising the business activities of the country.

The information called for by the second paragraph of the resolution is printed on pages 387–388.

Respectfully,
W. G. MCADOO,
Secretary.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 3929) for the construction of a private conduit across Michigan Avenue NE., in the District of Columbia.

The message also announced that the House disagrees to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 12600) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, and prior fiscal years, on account of war expenses, and for other purposes, asks a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. SHERLEY, Mr. EAGAN, and Mr. CANNON managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message further announced that the House disagrees to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 12229) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war, agrees to the conference asked for by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. ASHBROOK, Mr. SHOUSE, and Mr. LANGLEY managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message also announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 11984) to provide for the Fourteenth and subsequent decennial censuses, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also transmitted to the Senate resolutions (H. Res. 410) on the death of Hon. BENJAMIN R. TILLMAN, late a Senator from the State of South Carolina.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills, and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

H. R. 11247. An act providing for the protection of the uniform of friendly nations, and for other purposes; and

H. R. 12541. An act making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, for the armament thereof, for the procurement of heavy ordnance for trial and service, and for other purposes.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATIONS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 12600) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, and prior fiscal years, on account of war expenses, and for other purposes, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. MARTIN. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments and agree to the conference asked for by the House, the conferees on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the Presiding Officer appointed Mr. MARTIN, Mr. UNDERWOOD, and Mr. WARREN conferees on the part of the Senate.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

Mr. CUMMINS. I present a telegram in the form of a resolution adopted by the Iowa State Bar Association, in convention assembled at Des Moines, Iowa, urging upon Congress, upon the Senate of the United States especially, favorable action on the proposed amendment to the Constitution granting equal suffrage.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BANKHEAD). It will lie on the table.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. From the Committee on Finance I report back favorably, with amendments, House bill 11048, to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the establishment of a Bureau of War-Risk Insurance in the Treasury Department," approved September 2, 1914, as amended by the act approved June 12, 1917, and I submit a report (No. 548) thereon. This is a bill to extend the time of the operation of our marine war-risk insurance. It is essential that the bill should be passed now, as, if we take a recess, the war-risk insurance period would lapse, I understand. I shall call it up immediately after the close of the routine morning business. I would ask for its immediate consideration, but my own view has been that we ought to let the morning business be finished and then ask for the consideration of measures. I shall ask for its immediate consideration on the close of the morning business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be placed on the calendar.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. From the Committee on the Judiciary I report back favorably with amendments the bill (H. R. 8938) to equip the United States Penitentiary, Atlanta, Ga., for the manufacture of supplies for the use of the Government, for the compensation of prisoners for their labor, and for other purposes, and I submit a report (No. 547) thereon. I shall ask also this morning a little later on for the consideration of this bill. I have a letter from the President to the chairman of the subcommittee, the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN], pointing out why it is especially important that the bill should be passed at once.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be placed on the calendar.

Mr. MYERS, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which were referred the following bills, reported them each without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (S. 4679) to provide for the disposition of abandoned lighthouse and life-saving stations (Rept. No. 544); and

A bill (S. 4742) for the relief of the Yosemite Stone Co. (Rept. No. 545).

Mr. SUTHERLAND, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 560) for the relief of John Murphy, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 546) thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (S. 3601) for the relief of Christian M. Otto, reported adversely thereon, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

NOONDAY PRAYER.

Mr. BECKHAM. From the Committee on the Library I report back favorably without amendment the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 164) requesting the President to commend by proclamation to the people of the United States observance of the practice of prayer at noon each day for victory in the war, and I ask for its immediate consideration.

Mr. SMOOT. Let it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution will be read for information.

The Secretary read the joint resolution, as follows:

Joint resolution (S. J. Res. 164) requesting the President to commend by proclamation to the people of the United States observance of the practice of prayer at noon each day for victory in the war.

Whereas what is called the angelus, the practice of prayer for one minute at noon each day for the success of our country in the existing war, is being observed in the District of Columbia and some other parts of the United States; and

Whereas it is the desire of some good citizens that it be observed generally throughout the country to the end of the war; and

Whereas the sentiment is in accord with the traditional spirit and sentiment of this country and recognizes the overruling power of the Almighty: Therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That the President is requested to commend by proclamation to the people of the United States observance in their homes and elsewhere, until the end of the war, of the practice of prayer to God for at least one minute at noon each day for victory for our cause in the existing war.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, when this resolution was offered on Tuesday last I asked to have it go over under the rules, hence it went over until this morning. I shall not again object to it because I do not want to occupy the position of being the only Member of this body openly opposed to such a resolution.

However, Mr. President, I do not think it is appropriate that this body should legislate upon every conceivable subject merely because we are engaged in war. Those who feel that prayer will bring us victory do not need the stimulus of a Federal statute or a congressional resolution to inspire their action, nor, indeed, would they be persuaded from resort to prayer though we should enact prohibitory legislation, so that I do not perceive that the passage of this resolution will either promote or prevent the exercise of that reverent spirit which the great majority of our people possess, and which leads them to invoke spiritual aid when in trouble in the hope that it may prove efficacious.

But, to my mind, prayer for victory presents in large view a somewhat peculiar and inconsistent spectacle. All of the nations engaged in this war, on both sides, are praying to God for victory, and expect their prayers to be answered, the central empires as well as the entente allies. In Turkey the Mohammedans pray also for victory, and pray to the god which they worship.

The Omniscient Being, who presides over the destinies of the world, and who is said to be all powerful and all seeing, who knows everything that will occur, who knows that it must occur and when it will occur, must have foreseen the terrible calamity now afflicting His earthly children. Being omniscient and omnipotent, He permitted it to occur because of some hidden purpose of His own. If that be so, it must be equally certain in His wisdom that He will continue it until that purpose shall have been subserved. I do not perceive, therefore, that universal prayer by the contesting nations could do more at best than embarrass the Almighty Power if He shall pay due heed to the conflicting entreaties of friend and foe.

We shall win this war, Mr. President, by utilizing and mobilizing every active physical, economic, and social agency against our enemies and by persistent effort. All the prayers of all the peoples on earth in our behalf will be impotent if we fail to exercise our very best efforts in all directions for victory. It is an old but true saying that God helps those who help themselves. Others must shift for themselves and pray in vain for aid.

Napoleon said that the Almighty was on the side of the heaviest artillery, and that truth has been emphasized in every war that has been fought since mankind has been upon earth. He will be found on the side of the strongest and best equipped, the best trained, the best organized of those who make the best use of their best elements in the struggle. The Almighty is on that side which has the most deadly gas, the most effective artillery and artillerists, the best soldiers—and we have them—and, above all, which possesses that indomitable resolution to win that has ever been characteristic of Anglo-Saxon peoples, which has placed them in the van of progress and of civilization, and which will keep them there.

So while we are to obtain prayer by legislation, let us not forget that we, the American people, shall win this war or we shall lose it as we shall conduct ourselves in waging it.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, it is said that in ecclesiastical discussions in other centuries, in order to bring out a full and a fair statement of a case, they appointed a "devil's advocate." The Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] has eloquently served in that capacity. He has precipitated a discussion in which I shall not indulge, nor would the Senate, I think, be edified by a discussion of the Divine interposition in human affairs. I think a discussion of that kind belongs to another tribunal.

But I simply desire to state that in the old home of the late Senator Bard, Hueneme, Ventura County, Cal., is a society of women who have their boys at the front. It is a representative American situation. They decided one day upon every Friday to write letters to the boys, and the boys responded with so much gratitude and appreciation, believing that they were thought of while they were away on perilous duty, that a second idea was proposed, and that was to have a daily moment of prayer. From that small meeting this idea has spread over the country gradually; it has been adopted in part by Alabama, by Montana, by California, and recently by the District of Columbia; and now we find people agreeing upon an hour and a moment at midday for prayer for the safety of our boys and for the success of our arms, for victory and peace.

The boys, hearing of this, will feel heartened and cheered, because, I would say, most of them believe in the efficacy of prayer, and the mothers and the sisters will feel consoled, knowing that they are making their contribution. It is sufficient that they believe that they are making a contribution; it is sufficient that they believe that their appeals are heard; it is sufficient, as well, that the boys believe that prayer will, like the inspiration of Joan of Arc, help them in fighting for the freedom of the world.

It may be the Divine will to scourge a nation for a useful purpose. The world was once overwhelmed by a flood; it may have been intended to chasten the population. His ways are inscrutable; I will not presume to question them; but it is sufficient that these good men and women throughout the land will feel consoled by this practice and that the boys believe it is helping them.

The object of the resolution was simply to have a uniformity of the practice. This good lady, the president of the society, Mrs. Gertrude Dodds Treher, came to Washington, interviewed the President, and left with him a written request, giving the papers which show the interest of the communities throughout the land, and, through his secretary, the President writes:

"MRS. GERTRUDE DODDS TREHER,
"Hueneme, Cal.

"DEAR MRS. TREHER: I desire to acknowledge the receipt of your papers, explaining more fully than you did in conversation with the President and myself the interesting proposal which, I understand, originated with yourself, to have a moment at noon set aside by popular consent for heartfelt prayer every day during the war for the success of our arms, the safety of our men, and for victory and peace.

"The President thinks your idea a very beautiful one, but what may be done now to promote its general acceptance I am not prepared to say. I am told that many States have already acted in the matter and that Congress considers taking it up with a view of having uniformity of action. Therefore permit me to congratulate you on the success of your patriotic propaganda.

"I am,
"Very truly, yours, J. P. TUMULTY,
"Secretary."

The very purpose of the resolution is to have uniformity of action. I therefore trust there will be no objection to its passage.

I ask unanimous consent to insert one or two articles in the RECORD bearing upon this subject, because, if the resolution shall be adopted, the information contained in those articles will be valuable to those who desire to take up the idea and encourage voluntarily its general acceptance. There is no compulsion about it.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, if the Senator from Colorado will permit me, I should like to say that, in my opinion, the somewhat voluminous statement of the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] is sufficient, without the letters to which he has referred being printed in the RECORD.

Mr. PHELAN. I only ask to have inserted two short articles.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The matter referred to is as follows:

MOMENT OF PRAYER FOR OUR BOYS.

"The whole world to-day is either participants or witnesses of the most brutal, bloody warfare that has ever been fought upon the face of the earth. The minds of millions upon millions of suffering humanity are struggling through a pitiful state of confusion.

"The once glorious land of Europe is covered with the shadow of death.

"And the end is not yet.

"'How long, Oh, God, how long?' is the heart-rending cry that goes up from tortured souls, and He alone can give the answer, and He will give the answer when His children (in a body) lift their thoughts from this valley of tears and put them in tune with the great Infinite Being who rules the universe.

"Be he Jew or Gentile is of no moment. The hour of prayer is here and the children of God must turn their voices to Him in supplication.

"The lips of the Jewish mother, as well as the Gentile mother, press the farewell kiss upon the soft flesh of her boy's tender lips and her dear eyes smile the loving encouragement which strengthened him in his moment of parting, while the heart under her trembling bosom was being torn with grief as she bravely sent forth her son to an alien land.

"And so the work is akin to this terrible hour of sorrow, and together we should turn our thoughts to God in prayer.

"After all it is a small thing to do to lift our thoughts to God now that we need Him so. But it is a human trait to forget, and we need a constant reminder, and the ringing of our bells will be a lovely one.

"In every city and town of our country public bells of all description and church bells of every denomination should be rung at high noon to remind a busy people to raise their thoughts to God in supplication for the spiritual welfare of our liberty boys and their country. These bells should be rung for the length of one minute, and business and traffic should be suspended during that time. All the world is abroad at high noon, and the little school children going homeward will hear the bells and continue on their way with prayer in their hearts and upon their lips. And heads that never before were bowed will bow, and millions of them will continue to bow long after peace is declared.

"There is a great psychological reason for this request of a national movement of prayer, and the people of the town of Hueneme, Cal., have proven to their great satisfaction that the saying of prayers for the soldier boys holds a great power for good by letters we have received from our home-town boys.

"When our boys were conscripted they were called away from their home and its care-free indulgent environments and placed in cantonments with their splendid, though rigid, discipline. The first condition this produced was a desperate loneliness. And this was a psychological moment, and we took advantage of the fact to at once send the word forth to our boys that the home town had pledged itself in a body to back them with loving letters, gifts, and prayers.

"This produced a great effect upon our boys, and we obtained the very result we desired. And the following two quotations will suffice to show how well our boys understood just what the moral support of the home-town backing meant to them:

"'It's the spirit of such women as you that puts the "pep" into the boys behind the guns.'

"'You can not imagine how it affected me when I received your letters with their loving thoughts, carrying with them their great spiritual influence and loving reminders that the home town is back of me. It puts a new spirit into me and a great desire to make good.'

"We are going to have another call for our men to give up the home ties and go forth for the protection of womanhood and democracy, and the psychological moment will come again to plant the same knowledge in the mind of every liberty boy, while the whole mentality is in the throes of the unsettled conditions this patriotic call to war produces, that every soul in this great United States is gladly backing him with their loving thoughts, their finances, their sacrifices, and their prayers, and watch the force of the power they thereby receive and which they will recognize will be with our boys when they go to meet the Hun in 'No Man's Land.'

"It is a simple matter to make an indelible impression upon the human mind if you do so at the psychological moment, if we can get our country's people in a body, turning to God for help, and all making the same definite pleas that God's power be with our boys when they go to the trenches, our boys will receive it and go forth with a power of which God alone has the giving.

"But for our boys to receive it we must ask for it.

"All the world is awakening to the knowledge of the power of the unseen forces.

"All the world feels the forces behind the Kaiser.

"Our senses tell us that that which destroys, tears down, crushes, demoralizes, and murders is not of good, for good does not do these atrocious things.

"There was a Master sent to this world over nineteen hundred years ago, and His name was Christ.

"He came to teach the world the new law, and He came to teach the world how to use the power for good; and these are the things He told us to do to bring the power of the unseen forces for good to us:

"He told us to pray, and He said, 'When ye pray, pray thus,' and He gave us the Lord's Prayer.

"He also said, 'Where two or three are gathered together in my name, there am I in the midst of them,' proving that when many pray together it brings the Christ power to their midst.

"And He said, 'And all things whatsoever ye shall ask in prayer, believing, ye shall receive.'

"Our boys have gone to the trenches of France to fight the material battle of brains, science, and metal against brains, science, and metal, but their people at home should follow the teachings of the Master who came to enlighten the world in the knowledge of how to bring to their midst the power of the unseen forces for good. We are a God-loving Nation and we believe in the God power, and if we ever needed His help we need it now in this dreadful day of the brutal butchery of His children.

"So let the American people bring to their midst this great power of the unseen forces in this tragic hour of need by asking God in the words of the Lord's Prayer, 'Deliver us from evil,' or each person pray according to his own dictates.

"Throughout the country loyal Americans stand bareheaded for the length of five minutes while they pay their tribute to the music of our Star-Spangled Banner.

"'Tis a beautiful thought that California, the paradise of our country, has her mission bells from one end of her State to the other, silent symbols of by-gone prayers, her musical sentinels lining the great highway from the south to the north. And, where it is practical that they could be rung, it would be a glorious thing to hear as one speeds along the smooth surface of the broad roadway, the melody of the bells with their musical plea to the loyal Americans to lift their thoughts to the unseen power and bring it to their midst. Every sister State will follow our example and the peal of the liberty bell will reecho the melody of the California bells from the great Pacific to the broad Atlantic, calling to a sorrowing Nation to lift her thoughts to God in prayer.

"It is a psychological fact that where many are holding the same thought the result of that thought is obtained.

"Therefore, let us ask God-power to be given us, which shall deliver us from the evil which threatens the very destruction of the human race and, believing, ye shall receive it.

"Stop and look at this picture with me. A whole nation with heads bowed in prayer. Our people are communicating with God. I can see the hand of God raised over our country as if in benediction, and hear a voice from the heavens saying: 'Peace be with you.'

"GERTRUDE DODDS TREHER,
"Hueneme, Cal."

THE ANGELUS.

Writing in Sunday morning's Los Angeles Times, John S. McGroarty, father of the Mission Play, and an ardent worker for the retention and restablishment of the old missions and the "El Camino Real" route, contributes the following article in support of a suggestion advanced by Mrs. J. A. Treher, of Hueneme, who is now sojourning in Los Angeles:

"Down from the little sun-harbored town of Hueneme, on the golden coast of glory, where the purple Ventura hills keep watch above the sunset sea, comes a woman with a dream.

"It is a place for dreams—Hueneme (Y-nay-me)—snuggled amid lush meadows and the golden apples of Hesperides. The tides haunt it with endless voices. It is warm with sun and welcome. Morning canopies it with unrivaled dawns of gold and crimson and the exquisite tones of every color. Wandering clouds gather there at the close of day, as gypsies, to a rendezvous, and float like isles of amethyst upon azure skies.

"The woman is Gertrude Dodds Treher. I think you should know her name and where to reach her that you may share the dream with her and warm your heart in its fire.

"And this is her dream: That the mission bells on the King's Highway, in California, all the way from San Diego's Harbor of the Sun to Sonoma, in the Valley of the Seven Moons, shall be rung once each day at a given hour in remembrance of our soldiers in the trenches 'over there' in the alien lands.

"Moreover, it is hoped that all the bells in California—bells of every church, of whatever denomination, and bells in town halls and schoolhouses—indeed, wherever there is a bell—that it may be rung at this hour every day, and that, when they hear it the people will stop and say, 'God save our boys in the battles; keep them safe, O Lord, within the shadow of Thy wing.'

"There could be nothing more beautiful than this. And, if what we believe be true, there can be nothing more effective. The great God of the ages has never failed to hearken when the people cried to Him with uplifted hearts.

"It is easy to believe that if this were done in California it would be done as well in every State of the Union. The idea is infectious. The echo of our bells would set other bells to ringing throughout all the land.

"The very soul thrills at the thought of a thing like this—a whole nation standing with bowed heads, once every day, at the stroke of the hour; a hundred million lips speaking in prayer; the soul of America storming the gates of God.

"And what would it mean to them over there in the trenches and in the flame of battle? God pity the Hun, anyway; but how far more futile would he be to withstand the soldiers of a free land who fought with the armor of prayer upon them!

"But this is not all. At the stroke of the hour their heads would be bared, too, and they would say, 'They are thinking of us now at home. Our country is speaking with God. No sword can conquer us.'

"It may be that this is a dream and nothing more, this that has come to us out of beautiful Hueneme. But, however it be, it is yet something to warm us. It will never wholly fade. The stroke of the hour can not now pass without the music of a bell somewhere rung in remembrance and a bowed head and a soul that shall keep tryst with them who have crossed the seas to fight for liberty."

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, when in a discussion like this one descends to the use of epithets and of reflections upon the motives of his adversary it is fair to presume that he does so either through a desire to create religious prejudice or because he is destitute of legitimate argument. Because I have suggested that legislation is not necessary to the exercise of prayer and of devotion I am stigmatized as the "devil's advocate."

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. PHELAN. I certainly made no reflection upon the Senator's motives. I thought it was a nice bit of humor—I may have a wrong conception of what humor is—to refer to the Senator as a "devil's advocate." I believe in ecclesiastical societies learned churchmen are appointed as "devil's advocates" for the very purpose of bringing out the truth, so as not to have ex parte hearings upon matters of grave importance. I hope the Senator will not take the matter seriously. It was far from my thought to presume to reflect on the Senator. He is no "devil's advocate" in the sense that he advocates anything that the devil proposes, but he is a "devil's advocate" in this body every day for the purpose of eliciting the truth. If there is the least idea in the Senator's mind that I said anything uncomplimentary to him, I sincerely beg his pardon. I believe the Senator from Colorado is actuated by the highest motives in his critical comment on this and all other matters.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, with the definition which the Senator has placed upon his characterization, I am, of course, more than satisfied; but I think that the effect of his statement upon others was precisely that which was made upon my own mind.

Now, Mr. President, one word more, and I will take my seat. In what I have said I have not intended to do, and I hope I have not done, injury to the religious sensibilities of any Member of this body or of any person in the United States. I believe that the good men and women, the fathers and the mothers, the brothers and the sisters, the wives and the sweethearts of the million Americans across the sea will pray for the protection and safety of their loved ones just as fervently and just as frequently as though Congress had not stepped aside and by resolution practically required them to do so. If I thought that something of this kind were essential to awaken a spiritual feeling in the minds and the hearts of the American people, and particularly those who are directly connected by kin with those across the sea, I certainly would have not been heard against it, whatever my own convictions regarding its essential character.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, the subject matter of the resolution will hardly admit of extended discussion. The purpose of its introduction, the reason and necessity for it are self-evident. I will be permitted, I trust, to say, however, that I still have within my heart the lessons taught by my good mother in my youth, and my faith that the "effectual fervent prayers of a righteous man availeth much" has not been shaken in the least by the developments of recent years. I can not see any possible objection to the adoption of this resolution by the Senate and I hope that it may be agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, having been requested to introduce this resolution, and having assented to the request, because it is in accord with my sentiments, beliefs, and views, I will say that I greatly deplore that its introduction has brought about any dissension or difference of opinion in this body. I had supposed that it would not take more than 10 seconds to adopt it unanimously, and that no time would be wasted upon objections to it or criticism of it. I do not purpose now saying anything further except that having cheerfully introduced the resolution by request in a measure I stand sponsor for it and I am not willing silently to pass by any implication that might be derived from utterances heard to-day on this floor that there is no higher power over the affairs of this world than the material and human forces of the world. I must dissent from any such inference. I am glad to say a large majority of the people of this country do not believe that; I do not believe it; and I simply take this occasion and method to express my dissent from any such implied or expressed materialistic view.

I am as much in favor of a vigorous, hearty, unrelenting material prosecution of this war, with all material forces at our command, to a victorious finish as anybody in the United States can be; but I believe there are other and higher forces involved, and I believe this simple resolution expresses the best sentiment and the firm belief of an overwhelming majority of the people of this country as it expresses my sentiment and belief. I believe its adoption would be most fitting and appropriate.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I am in favor of the angelus. I do not feel any disposition to offer any apology in asserting that I firmly and devoutly believe in prayer. I believe it is a great spiritual, moral, and material force. I will not now take the time to analyze its psychology or its religious aspects, and I agree, at the same time, that the marshaling of gigantic material forces of men, ships, supplies, cannon, and aeroplanes is essential to win this war.

The laws of God, as they manifest themselves day by day to men, are the laws of cause and effect, and from those laws men derive the rules by which they are governed. By wise deduction from the laws of God and of cause and effect men write the laws of men, which sometimes are often devoutly spoken of as the laws of God; but the laws of men are derived from the laws of cause and effect. One of the gigantic causes which enable men to win battles is a resolute determination to win, a fixed purpose to victory, and the ringing of the angelus at 12 o'clock every day, calling every man and woman of this land to pray to God for victory will fix victory and the idea of victory and the purpose of victory in the American heart even more strongly and broadly than it is now fixed—a consummation devoutly to be wished. The angelus is a force by which to win this war. I am in favor of the angelus as a war measure, but I believe devoutly in the principle of prayer, regardless of peace or war.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

TELEGRAPH AND TELEPHONE CONTROL.

Mr. CUMMINS. I ask unanimous consent for the withdrawal of Senate joint resolution 163, to insure the continuous operation of electrical communicating systems, to guard the secrecy of war dispatches, and prevent communications between public enemies, from the Committee on Military Affairs and its reference to the Committee on Interstate Commerce. This is agreeable both to the author of the joint resolution and the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs. I think nothing further need be said about it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If the Senator will permit me, I should like to ask him what is the title of the joint resolution, or what is the subject matter?

Mr. CUMMINS. It is the joint resolution proposed by the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD] granting authority to the President to take over the telephones and the telegraphs.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I think it should properly go to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Iowa? The Chair hears none, and the joint resolution is referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. HALE. I introduce a joint resolution, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maine introduces a joint resolution, which will be read.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 165) to appoint a joint committee to consider the question of ventilation of the House of Representatives and the Senate was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That a joint committee of seven be appointed to consider the question of ventilation of the House of Representatives and the Senate, three members of said committee to be appointed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives and three members to be appointed by the Presiding Officer of the Senate, and Elliott Woods, Superintendent Capitol Building and Grounds, to be the seventh member of said committee.

Mr. HALE. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, was not a committee of this same character provided for some time ago, with reference to the Senate?

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I think in 1913 such a committee was appointed. They investigated the matter, but took no action. I have talked with the chairman of that committee, the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], and he tells me that he has no objection to my going ahead with another committee. They are not doing anything on the subject.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator whether it is customary to investigate the ventilation of the House of Representatives. Would it not be sufficient for us to investigate our own ventilation?

Mr. HALE. I think, Mr. President, the appropriation ought to be a joint one if anything is done. I have taken up the matter already with Members of the House, and they are very anxious, in case we go ahead, that something should be done at the same time with regard to the House.

Mr. PENROSE. Have the preceding efforts at securing ventilation, made in the last 70 or 80 years without success, applied to the Senate alone or to both branches of Congress?

Mr. HALE. I can not say.

Mr. PENROSE. I was only seeking information as to the precedents.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I should like to have the joint resolution read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will again read the resolution.

The Secretary again read the joint resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

GENERAL DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATIONS—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. MARTIN. I submit the conference report on the general deficiency appropriation bill and move that the Senate proceed to its consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Virginia submits a conference report, which will be read.

The Secretary proceeded to read the conference report. During the reading,

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I understood the Senator from Virginia to ask for the present consideration of this report. I did not hear the Chair inquire if there was objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Virginia had the right to submit the report at any time.

Mr. GORE. Yes, sir. The question then will be as to its consideration.

The Secretary resumed and concluded the reading of the conference report, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 12600) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, and prior fiscal years, on account of war expenses, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 4 and 20.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 5, 6, 7, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, and 21, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 1, and agree to the same with amendments as follows: Restore the matter stricken out amended as follows: On page 2 of the bill, line 7, strike out the sum "$110,000,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$100,000,000," and in line 11 of the same page strike out the sum "$50,000,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$40,000,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 2, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 4 of the matter inserted by said amendment, before the sum "$25,000," insert the following: "fiscal year 1919"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 3, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Transpose the matter inserted by said amendment to follow line 5, on page 26 of the bill; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 8, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 2 of the matter inserted by said amendment, after the word "Senators," insert the following: "fiscal year 1919"; and the Senate agree to the same.

THOMAS S. MARTIN,
O. W. UNDERWOOD,
F. E. WARREN,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

SWAGAR SHERLEY,
JOHN J. EAGAN,
J. G. CANNON,
Managers on the part of the House.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Shall the Senate proceed to the consideration of the conference report?

Mr. GORE. I object to the present consideration of the report.

Mr. MARTIN. As I recall the rule, the question has to be submitted to the Senate and acted upon without debate.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, if this is a report from a committee, it has to go over one day if there be objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Virginia was recognized and moved to take up the report for consideration.

Mr. GORE. Was the report on the table or did the Senator from Virginia just make the report from the committee this morning?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It was just reported this morning.

Mr. GORE. If it was reported this morning, then it has to be taken up by unanimous consent.

Mr. MARTIN. Oh, no; not a conference report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A conference report can be taken up on motion. The Senator from Virginia moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the conference report.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The report was agreed to.

LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I submit a resolution which I ask to have read and lie over until a future day, when I shall ask an opportunity to submit some remarks upon it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the resolution.

The resolution (S. Res. 275) was read, as follows:

Resolved, That it is opportune for the Governments of the United States, Japan, and Great Britain now allied in war against the powers of central Europe to enter into lasting agreements to render it inexpedient for any one and impossible for said central powers to enter upon, engage in, or pursue a course of warfare, or use methods of warfare on the Pacific Ocean not justified or warranted by the laws of war as heretofore accepted and construed by this Government and its allies.

Such agreements should include provisions—

(1) That the Chinese Republic and the Russian people also, when able to establish a sufficiently strong and stable government, and any other government on the Pacific littoral, prepared to contribute to the common purpose reasonable proportions of sea power, may be admitted as signatories;

(2) That no warships or other armed vessels of any power which has heretofore or shall hereafter pursue an unwarranted course of warfare, or use illegal methods of warfare on the high seas, shall be permitted to have, hold, or obtain ports, harbors, possessions, or landing places on the Pacific Ocean when such warfare may be waged or which may be used as bases of offense or places of refuge; and

(3) Binding such allied nations to enforce such agreements by their united sea power and such auxiliary forces as may be necessary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will lie on the table and be printed. The morning business is closed.

TUBE LINES BETWEEN NEW YORK AND NEW JERSEY.

Mr. MARTIN. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House joint resolution 311, which came over from the House, continuing the appropriations in regard to certain departments of the Government.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Virginia yield to me for a moment? I was on my feet to call up a resolution submitted by the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] on last Tuesday morning, and which went over for the day. On Wednesday last we had no session. I think there will be no objection whatever to it. It is a resolution directing the Committee on Interstate Commerce to inquire into certain features of taking possession of some of the suburban lines about New York City. As I said, I think there will be no objection at all to it.

Mr. MARTIN. The joint resolution that I have called up is in exactly the same position. It came over in the same way; but still, I will yield to the Senator from Iowa. The Commissioners of the District of Columbia can not pay their employees unless this joint resolution passes before to-morrow night. However, I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think this resolution will be adopted by unanimous consent. I ask for the adoption of the resolution, which has already been read.

Mr. KING. I ask to have the resolution read, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the resolution.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 272) submitted by Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN on the second instant, as follows:

Whereas the United States Railroad Administration, operating under the provisions of the act of March 21, 1918, has assumed jurisdiction over the railroad systems of the country for and during the continuance of the war, "to meet conditions growing out of war"; and

Whereas it was the purpose of the act in question to take over only those transportation lines which engage in general traffic, passenger and freight, and not roads engaged solely in local, urban, or interurban passenger business; and

Whereas the Director General of Railroads has assumed jurisdiction over the so-called "tube" lines running under the Hudson River, between the New York terminal and the cities of Jersey City and Newark, N. J., a class of traffic having no relation whatever to war conditions; and

Whereas by order of the Director General of Railroads, the rate of fare between Jersey City and New York was increased 100 per cent, which increase was subsequently annulled; and

Whereas the rate of fare between New York and Newark, a purely local business, has been increased from 17 cents to 27 cents, or 60 per cent, though the traffic over said lines has no relation to war conditions: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Committee on Interstate Commerce of the Senate be instructed to inquire into the conditions above set forth, with a view to ascertaining why these purely local lines were taken over; whether such taking over was in accordance with the spirit and letter of the act in question; why the order was issued increasing from 5 to 10 cents the fare between New York and Jersey City and why said order was canceled; why the fare between New York and Newark has been increased 60 per cent.

Mr. CUMMINS. The remaining part of the resolution, I think, was stricken out, or the resolution was amended so as to omit the last paragraph, relating to the payment of expenses out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

PHOSPHATE ROCK.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President——

Mr. MARTIN. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee. The Senator thinks the matter he has in hand will take only a minute. I will yield to him temporarily.

Mr. SHIELDS. I offer a resolution, which I ask to have read, and then I shall ask for its present consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the resolution.

The resolution (S. Res. 274) was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of Agriculture be, and he is hereby, directed to furnish to the United States Senate all the information available to the Department of Agriculture concerning phosphate rock, commonly called floats, found in the United States, and the use of the same in the manufacture of fertilizers in particular, as follows:

First. The location of the beds or deposits of phosphate rock found in the several States, and probable extent and the quality of the several deposits.

Second. The quantity of phosphate rock mined and used in the United States or exported annually, and the average or ordinary cost of the same per ton.

Third. The quantity or proportion of the entire phosphate rock mined in the United States that is used in the manufacture of commercial fertilizers, and that which is used for fertilizing purposes in the raw state.

Fourth. What experiments have been made by the Department of Agriculture and those of the several States of the Union in the use of raw, ground phosphate rock as a fertilizer, the various crops to which it has been applied, and the results of those experiments.

Fifth. The value and necessity of phosphorus for the production of the grain, vegetable, and cotton crops commonly produced in the United States.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, food must win the war for America and our allies. Without it the people at home can not exist and the armies in the field can not fight. Arms, munitions, aircraft, and ships come after food and are useless without it. Food comes first and is a fundamental necessity in peace and war. The United States must furnish it for this war. This great burden and responsibility has been placed upon the shoulders of the American farmer, and they have met it and will continue to discharge this patriotic duty with the full measure that all other classes of workers are doing their part. They must produce food for our people at home and our armies in France and also for our allies and their armies. They must, however, be fairly treated and protected from all exorbitant demands for supplies necessary for agricultural production. Commercial fertilizers are necessary in many of the States for the production of an average crop and beyond all question for such as will meet the present emergency, and everything possible should be done to furnish more fertilizers and cheaper fertilizers to the farmers of the country. The constituent elements of a well-balanced fertilizer are nitrogen, phosphorous, and potash in quantities in the order stated. Chilean nitrate of soda since the war begun has arisen in price so great as to make the use of it almost prohibitory, and Congress has appropriated millions of dollars for the purpose of manufacturing air nitrogen to take its place, the great plant for this purpose being constructed at the Muscle Shoals, in the Tennessee River, a project which I took great interest in and the success of which, I think, I contributed something. Congress has also provided for the development and utilization of the great potash deposits in the far West—the Pittman bill being enacted for that purpose—and every indication is that we will soon have an ample supply from this source. There has been no provision for increasing the supply of phosphorous or reducing its cost, which is now far greater than it should be when we consider the great deposits of it in the United States.

The object of this resolution is to ascertain the extent and value of those deposits and give publicity to them, so that proper legislation may be enacted to furnish phosphorous to the farmers of the country in greater quantities and at less cost.

I ask for the immediate considerartion of the resolution, that this information may be obtained for the benefit of the farmers of the country not only during the war but for all time to come.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. SHIELDS. I do.

Mr. KING. Probably the question I was about to ask would be better propounded after the resolution is taken up for consideration. I merely wish to direct the attention of the Senator to the fact that it seems to me the Geological Survey or the Interior Department possesses this information to a greater degree than the Agricultural Department. The Geological Bureau, to my knowledge, have been making very extensive investigations as to phosphate and other products, and I think some leaflets have been printed that are rather elaborate on the subject.

Mr. SHIELDS. I understand that investigations have been made by that bureau, but this information I am confident is also available to the Agricultural Department, where some investigations have been made with a view of the manufacture of fertilizer. I am satisfied that all that is necessary for the present purpose can be obtained there. If not, of course, resort will be had to other sources.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. WALSH. I do not object to the present consideration of the resolution, but I wish to make a suggestion to the Senator from Tennessee.

The Senate by unanimous consent proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. WALSH. I suggest to the Senator from Tennessee that the language of the resolution, "commonly called float," might very properly be eliminated. The Senator from Tennessee is undoubtedly aware of the fact that phosphate exists in two forms—first, in the form of float, and, second, in the form of rock in place. The deposits of rock in place far surpass in extent, so far as our present information goes, the float deposits. So I am afraid the restrictive language would not give us the comprehensive information the Senator undoubtedly desires to get.

Mr. SHIELDS. I think the resolution is so drawn to cover the whole subject, but I will agree to any amendment that will amplify it and accomplish the purposes desired.

Mr. WALSH. I ask that the amendment may be stated.

The SECRETARY. Strike out the three words "commonly called float" after the words "phosphate rock."

Mr. SHIELDS. I have no objection to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WALSH. I have another suggestion to make. I suggest that the Secretary also be asked what legislation is necessary to make available deposits of phosphate upon the public domain.

Mr. SHIELDS. I have no objection to such an amendment. I want all available information upon this important matter.

Mr. WALSH. I will say to the Senator in this connection that this body passed some four or five months ago a bill the purpose of which was to open to appropriation the deposits of phosphate rock upon the public domain. There is there an almost limitless supply of this essential of fertilizer so much needed for the agricultural development of the country, as suggested by the author of the resolution. That bill went to the House and was passed by the House in the form of a substitute. I understand the matter is now in conference. I should be very glad to hear from some member of the Public Lands Committee as to the probability of a speedy report upon that bill.

Mr. MYERS. What bill is it?

Mr. WALSH. The bill dealing with phosphate lands.

Mr. MYERS. Oh, the general land-leasing bill. The Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] is the senior conferee on the part of the Senate on that bill. He is in charge for the Senate of the conference on it. He is in the Chamber and can enlighten Senators as to the progress of the conference. I ask him to make a statement about it.

Mr. SHIELDS. I wish, before the Senator from Montana takes his seat, to inquire whether or not a report upon the subject of legislation required for the development of phosphate deposits on the public lands would cause any great delay in getting this information. There is no legislation required in regard to phosphate deposits that have been mined and utilized for years in Tennessee, Florida, and South Carolina, where the present supply comes from. I know of those vast deposits in the West on the public lands and elsewhere, but heretofore, as I understand, the cost of transportation has made them unavailable to the Southern States, where 70 per cent of the fertilizers are used, especially when they have great deposits right in their own borders. If it will not delay the inquiry further, I have no objection to the amendment; but the demand for fertilizer for the crop next year is imperative, if we are to have more than an ordinary crop in this great emergency. I think there ought to be no delay in giving the greatest publicity to the supply of this necessary element of fertilizer.

Mr. WALSH. I feel able to assure the Senator from Tennessee that no delay can possibly ensue. I simply propose to ask the Secretary of Agriculture to express his view as to what legislation is necessary, and that, of course, could not involve much delay. It was my idea that he would either suggest the approbation of the bill to which I have referred or would outline his views as to what other legislation might be deemed necessary.

Mr. SHIELDS. The apprehension of delay was suggested to me by the Senator stating that there is some legislation now pending on the subject over which there is some trouble.

Mr. WALSH. There is; but that would not, as it seems to me, and as I think the Senator from Tennessee will recognize, cause any delay whatever in getting a report from the Secretary of Agriculture giving us his opinion simply as to what legislation is necessary.

Mr. SHIELDS. The Senator has in mind legislation which is necessary for the western deposits, and I would be very glad in any way to expedite their development, for we need phosphates and need them badly.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, just one word further. In view of the suggestion made by the Senator that deposits are not available because of their remoteness from the section in which the fertilizer would be used, I am able to apprise the Senator from Tennessee, and I know he will be glad to have the information, that in the same locality where these deposits exist there is a possibility of the manufacture of sulphuric acid in unlimited quantities, and that by a treatment of the phosphate rock with sulphuric acid it may be reduced to such a concentrated form as to make it possible to transport the commercial product to almost any of the agricultural sections of the United States. It was with a view to expedite if possible a realization of that source of supply that I suggested the amendment to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. SHIELDS. Sulphuric acid is now used for reducing phosphate rock to a soluble or plant food condition, and one of the great objects of the development of water power of the country is that it can be reduced by an electric furnace at one-half the cost of sulphuric acid. Of course, if the raw material is treated in the West it will greatly reduce the cost of transportation, and make a greater supply available for the country needs. The farmers and planters whom I represent, and those in other Southern States, use, as I have said, 70 per cent of fertilizer manufactured in this country and will of course be greatly benefited by an increased supply, and I am anxious to do anything possible to contribute to such increase. The Congress can not possibly render a greater service to the country than emancipate the farmers from the oppression and extortion of those controlling the manufacture and sale of commercial fertilizers. The country needs more fertilizer and cheaper fertilizer during the war and when peace comes to us.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Montana will be read.

The SECRETARY. Add, at the end of the resolution:

Sixth. What legislation is necessary to make available deposits of phosphate rock on the public domain.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

Mr. WALSH. I trust we may now be informed by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], who has come into the Chamber.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, the bill regarding which inquiry was made has been in conference for about six weeks. The bill I am referring to is the one concerning which inquiry was made by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], known as the general leasing bill, which includes legislation for the development of oil, gas, phosphate, coal, and sodium on Government lands. The managers on the part of the Senate have been ready at all times for a conference with the managers on the part of the House. The House managers have been so notified. It has been impossible, however, to get the committee together by reason of the fact that several of the managers on the part of the House were engaged as conferees on the so-called water-power bill, and it has consumed all their time.

We have had two full meetings of the committee. We were to determine, if there is a recess, whether or not we would sit during the recess. That, of course, depends upon the engagements of the various members of the conference.

I wish to say that I believe it is going to require several weeks of very close work to arrive at an agreement between the Senate conferees and the House conferees. I state that by reason of the present indication from the first two meetings had; I am perfectly confident, however, that an agreement will be reached unless it is prevented by outside influence, and if it is prevented by outside influence I am perfectly confident that this is the last time this character of legislation will ever again get as far as a conference committee.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I should like to suggest to the Senator, I think the conferees ought to act upon the theory that we are not going to have any recess. There has been no official action taken by either body, and I believe the conferees ought to act on that theory. We may have a recess, but this is very important legislation, and the Senator's last statement simply emphasizes the importance of action. I hope that the Senate conferees at any rate will proceed on the theory that there is going to be a continuous session until we dispose of the important business before us.

Mr. PITTMAN. The committee was acting on the theory that there will be no recess, but I think there is no member of the committee who believes that will be a fact. I think every member of the committee has had sufficient experience in this body and in the House of Representatives to believe that when the entire Senate has a violent desire of sufficient intensity to recess they generally recess and that the objection of one or two Members to the contrary notwithstanding has never prevented a recess.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, am I to understand that the Senate is now to vote upon this resolution?

Mr. MARTIN. Oh, no; the motion is to take up the joint resolution for consideration.

Mr. BORAH. Simply to take up the resolution?

Mr. MARTIN. Yes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN] to proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution.

Mr. GORE. I ask for a division on that, Mr. President.

The question being put, on a division it was agreed to.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 311) making appropriations for certain necessary operations of the Government and of the District of Columbia for the month of July, 1918, and for other purposes.

Mr. GORE. I ask that the joint resolution be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the joint resolution.

The Secretary read the joint resolution, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the necessary operations of the Government, so far as they relate to the support of the Army and the Department of Agriculture, including food production operations heretofore provided for by law, and of the District of Columbia, as they were being carried on at the close of the fiscal year ended June 30, 1918, are hereby authorized to be continued notwithstanding that appropriations therefor for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, or any part of such fiscal year, have not been made by law, and there is appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, an amount sufficient to carry on such necessary operations during the month of July, 1918, as the same were carried on during the fiscal year 1918, and including also those operations now authorized by law and not carried on prior to July 1, 1918: Provided, That expenditures for the District of Columbia shall be paid one-half from the revenues of the District of Columbia and one-half from the Treasury of the United States: Provided further, That no greater amount shall be expended during July, 1918, than an amount equal to one one-twelfth of the amount of any appropriations available for the fiscal year 1918, excepting that the rate of expenditure for the month of July, 1917, or for the month of June, 1918, if either be greater than such one-twelfth, may be continued during the month of July, 1918, and where necessary operations have been or may be authorized by law without having been carried on prior to the 1st day of July, 1918, there may be expended during the month of July, 1918, only so much as may be necessary adequately to carry on the operations so authorized: And provided also, That the appropriation made by this resolution for any necessary operation shall not be available beyond the date when other appropriations hereafter are made therefor and the amount which may be expended hereunder shall be in lieu of an equal amount of an appropriation for the same purposes, if there be one hereafter made, it being the purpose of this resolution that an appropriation hereafter made, for any operation for the current fiscal year, shall not be in addition to the appropriation herein made but shall be considered as the sole appropriation so that any amount expended hereunder shall be treated as an expenditure under such appropriation for the current fiscal year.

This joint resolution shall be construed as authorizing salaries and compensation for officers, clerks, and other employees holding offices or employment for which specific salaries or compensation were appropriated for the fiscal year 1918, to continue during July, 1918, to be paid at the same rate while lawfully holding such offices or employment until the appropriations therefor have been made for the fiscal year 1919, and thereafter to be paid only at the rate provided in said appropriations.

Appropriations for the service of the fiscal year 1919 made in acts approved since June 30, 1918, shall be available for all purposes therein provided for from and including the 1st day of July, 1918, and all obligations incurred pursuant to the terms of said acts as approved are ratified and confirmed from and including the said 1st day of July.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, I have a number of amendments to offer, all for the same purpose. The joint resolution continues the appropriations only for the month of July, and I wish the joint resolution amended so as to include August as well as July. That will require a change wherever the word "July" appears. I send the first amendment to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 3, strike out the words "month of July" and insert the words "months of July and August."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator what is the necessity of inserting another month?

Mr. MARTIN. The object of it, Mr. President, is that in case of a recess Congress might determine to make it longer than for the month of July, and it is desired in that event to provide that the appropriations shall go on and that the Government be carried on without compelling a more limited recess than Congress might desire. The House passed the joint resolution providing for the continuation of the appropriations only for July, but the chairman of the House committee stated that the developments of the situation were not satisfactory and that the House would like to have the joint resolution made to cover August as well as July. I am offering the amendment, therefore, simply in case the three appropriations bills as yet unacted on are not passed during the month of July that the continuing of the current appropriations will last for the month of August as well as for the month of July.

Mr. BORAH. The entire theory of the amendment, then, is that we are going to take a recess during July and a part of August?

Mr. MARTIN. Not entirely, because, although we may not take a recess, the deadlock upon these bills may last longer than July. There seems to have been reached an impossible situation; and there is no certainty at all, even if Congress should remain in session, that the difficulties will be adjusted during the month of July. It is certainly safer to allow the margin of July and August, so that there may be a recess longer than for the remainder of July, if Congress desires, and certainly to provide for these appropriations longer than July in case Congress does not pass the appropriation bills during the month of July, whether we take a recess or not.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator what is the program, if there is any, with reference to considering a bill to take over the telegraph service prior to a recess?

Mr. MARTIN. I do not know of any program. I do not know what will be done; but this measure is important regardless of that, because even now the departments covered by the joint resolution have been operating without authority of law for a week, and the District Commissioners advise me there is a large pay roll to-morrow which they can not meet unless the joint resolution passes to-day.

Mr. BORAH. That brings me to another point. Why is it necessary to incorporate the appropriations for the District of Columbia and for the Agricultural Department in one joint resolution? Could they not be separated?

Mr. MARTIN. They could have been separated, but the House sent the joint resolution here in its present form to provide for carrying on certain departments of the Government during the month of July. The House committee framed the resolution, it was passed by that body, they sent it over here, and it is before the Senate to dispose of it as it sees fit. I see no reason why it should not be acted on as it is. We ought not to discontinue the services in one department more than in the others. I believe it vitally important that the wheels of Government shall revolve and that people who work for the Government shall be paid, and they can not be paid unless this joint resolution passes to-day. There is a large pay roll to-morrow in all the departments.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I want to take this opportunity to say to the Senator from Virginia that, as I understand, the principal argument, so far as any damage to anyone by reason of delay is concerned, will be in the payment of the employees of the District of Columbia. I certainly would not want to interfere with that, and if the joint resolution were confined to appropriations for the District of Columbia I would have, so far as I am concerned, no objection whatever to the passage of the joint resolution, and I would have no occasion——

Mr. MARTIN. If the Senator will excuse me, there is a large pay roll in the other departments; the difficulty is not limited to the District of Columbia.

Mr. NORRIS. I would have no objection to including the Army.

Mr. MARTIN. There is a large pay roll in the Agricultural Department.

Mr. NORRIS. The chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs told me just a few moments ago that he thought there would be an agreement on the Army appropriation bill before 3 o'clock this afternoon.

Mr. MARTIN. If the Senator will excuse me, I will tell him that that does not relieve the situation, for they already have been going on for a week without authority of law and without money.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; the Senator, of course, could apply that to other matters, and there may be some reason for it in that aspect; but I was about to say when the Senator interrupted me that, so far as I am concerned, I would have no objection to including the Army. Here, however, we have a condition in the Agricultural Department that is different. We had a fair, honest contest in the Senate the other day, as we had in April, when the bill was before us, with regard to the minimum price of wheat. That question was fought out fairly, and by a very large majority the Senate not only fixed the price of wheat as it is now in the bill that passed the Senate, the Agricultural appropriation bill, but it declined to instruct its conferees to recede. Since that vote of 46 to 19, I think it was—I refer to the vote taken just a few days ago—the conferees, in order to get that bill again into the House, agreed to report a disagreement. That report was adopted by the Senate and is before the House of Representatives now, having been reported there the other day, and under the rules of that body it is in order to take it up to-day and pass it there.

If this joint resolution is passed, we might just as well face the situation that will develop. The result that is going to happen will be that, so far as amendment numbered 44 is concerned, regarding wheat, it is dead, because when Congress reconvenes in August or September part of the wheat will be in flour.

It seems to me it is only fair, when the House is right on the eve of acting on that proposition, that, so far as the appropriations for the Agricultural Department are concerned, they should be excluded from this joint resolution. If that were done, so far as I am concerned, there would be no further opposition to it, and I do not know of any other Senator who would be opposed to it; but it seems hardly fair, Mr. President, when a matter has been fought out twice, as the wheat amendment has been, after a full and open debate and fair consideration, and a decision arrived at, that this indirect way should be taken to nullify the will of the Senate. If the House acts and refuses to agree to any compromise, then we shall have a different proposition before us.

It seems to me that it is hardly fair, under all the conditions, that right on the eve of the settlement of that question one way or the other by a contest in the House, we should pass a joint resolution that will practically put it over to a time when, in the very nature of things, nothing of any avail can be done.

Mr. President, there is another reason, although it is not nearly so imperative as that, why it seems to me the agricultural part of the joint resolution should be omitted, and that is this other bill that has on it the so-called war prohibition amendment. That will go over. It seems to me we ought to pass that bill before we recess. Personally, I do not believe we ought to recess at all; but certainly I think the Senate ought not to recess with these conference reports just on the eve of being finished. Just as important now as at any time is the legislation before the Congress. Particularly we ought not to pass at this time a joint resolution which will nullify the action of the Senate in regard to amendment No. 44 to the general agricultural bill.

As I said before, it seems to me to be hardly the right thing to do. If the House takes up that matter and acts on it, and gets a fair vote on it, and the House by a considerable majority refuses to make any compromise, my opposition to this procedure, as far as that part of it is concerned, will disappear. I concede that a time might come when it would be necessary for the Senate simply to back down, even though it might be unanimous; but since April the House of Representatives never has had an opportunity to have before it the Agricultural bill containing amendment No. 44.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. STERLING. May I ask the Senator from Nebraska if amendment No. 44 is the prohibition amendment?

Mr. NORRIS. No; it is the wheat amendment.

Mr. STERLING. I understood the Senator to say that this joint resolution affected also the prohibition matter.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; assuming that we take a recess, it will be postponed until after the recess. Of course, that would not necessarily be fatal to that matter. That is only a postponement.

Mr. STERLING. It is not directly involved in the joint resolution?

Mr. NORRIS. No; but the wheat amendment is directly involved, because everybody knows that the postponement of that for six weeks means its death, and that is not the right way to kill it. If it is to be killed, let it be killed squarely, and let the men who kill it be responsible for its demise. If the House acts as it usually does under its rules, that matter will be disposed of to-day in the House of Representatives. If a compromise proposition comes back here, it may be agreed to before we adjourn to-day. It does not seem to me that it is right, under those circumstances, to pass a joint resolution that would enable some conferees simply to sit back and say, "We will do nothing for a few days, and by that means we will nullify the action of the Senate."

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I am inclined to believe that the Army appropriation bill will be agreed upon in conference this afternoon; but in case it should not be, does not the Senator believe that the continuation of the appropriations for last year for the support of the Army would not be a drop in the bucket? For instance, the pending appropriation bill amounts to about $12,000,000,000 as necessary to care for the Army, whereas the bill of last year, while I do not recall the amount, was very much smaller.

Mr. NORRIS. I am very much obliged to the Senator for that suggestion. I am glad he has made it. It recalls to my mind another important thing that I think we ought to take into consideration with reference to this recess.

As the Senator has said, the appropriations of last year that this joint resolution would extend in the case of the Army and the Navy would not be a drop in the bucket. That is another reason why there ought to be no recess until the conference report on the Army bill is agreed to, although I would have no objection to extending the time as to the Army bill. But we ought to be here ready to take up that conference report when it comes in; and the minute we pass this joint resolution, if we pass it now, those who are fighting on any of these propositions, knowing that the old law is going to continue, will continue their fight a great deal harder than they would if they knew that the carrying on of the Government was dependent upon their doing something and doing it right away.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, so far as the Army appropriation bill is concerned, I have not seen a Senator or a Member of the other House who contemplates a recess until that bill is passed. So far as I have been able to ascertain, all of us realize that that bill is of such vital importance, and the necessary expenditure would be so poorly cared for by a continuation of last year's appropriations, that it would be little short of criminal for us to leave here until we pass the Army appropriation bill, and nobody contemplates doing it. But, Mr. President, if we pass it, this joint resolution is absolutely necessary for the Army, because they have been carrying on operations for a week without money and without authority of law. This joint resolution takes care of the expenditures which have been incurred during that week. It is essential for the War Department, as for all the other departments, whether the Army appropriation bill passes or not, that this continuing resolution shall pass, for on its face it takes care of the past as well as the future.

Mr. President, the Senator says a good deal about indirection—that this is an indirect method of getting at the wheat business. The only indirection that I have discovered comes from the Senator and those who are associated with him in this contest. If a denial of the passage of this joint resolution is the judgment of the Senate, it is solely to put the House under duress, with the idea that by that indirect method you can compel them to do something that they do not want to do.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MARTIN. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to call the attention of the Senator to the fact that under the rules of the House to-day is the first time they have had an opportunity to vote on this matter.

Mr. MARTIN. That may be; but it has been before them for three months, and they have not utilized that time to act on it. The conferees on the part of the Senate came to me more than a week ago and told me that they had reached an impassable barrier, and asked me to introduce a joint resolution instructing the Senate conferees to yield, because it was impossible ever to accomplish anything with the House conferees; and that condition continues now. So far as I can ascertain, there is no hope of an agreement. The House conferees on yesterday said they had not the slightest idea of yielding an iota.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. But it is in the House now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Virginia yield, and if so to whom?

Mr. MARTIN. I yield. I believe the Senator from North Dakota first rose.

Mr. McCUMBER. I simply wanted to suggest to the Senator from Virginia that since this bill passed, the Senate has twice voted as to whether it would sustain the conferees of the Senate. It has voted by a very heavy majority both times to sustain the action of the Senate conferees. Inasmuch as this bill passed the House only by a very small majority, and about one-third of the Members of the House did not vote upon it at all, does not the Senator think, as a matter of courtesy, that the House ought to have the opportunity to vote again upon it—once at least—to see whether or not it sustains its conferees? That is all that we are asking—that the House vote upon it again. Then, if there is a deadlock we undoubtedly will find some way to settle it.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, that contest can go. The passage of this joint resolution has nothing in the world to do with it. Nobody is asking to interfere with that contest. It has been on since the 5th of April, and it can go on as long as the conferees of the respective Houses, and the respective Houses themselves, desire it to go on; but the question is, Will you deny supplies for carrying on the Government while that controversy goes on? That is all there is to it.

Mr. McCUMBER. I was going to suggest also that we can get out of a part of the difficulty by just striking out the Agricultural Department from this joint resolution and passing it with reference to the Army bill and all other matters that are in arrears.

Mr. MARTIN. If the Senate thinks it can put the House under duress by denying supplies to the Agricultural Department and chooses to adopt an amendment for that purpose, it is its privilege. I have nothing to say about it. Let the Senate do it.

Mr. McCUMBER. I do not want to put them under duress. I simply want the House to vote on it.

Mr. MARTIN. They will vote on it whether this joint resolution is passed or not. There is no virtue in that except to put them under duress. That is all there is to it; and I do not think it will be operative for that purpose.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator understands there is something else to it.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. MARTIN. I do.

Mr. GORE. I think the Senator from Virginia, without intending to be inaccurate, has not accurately stated the issue. He has stated two different issues as the only issue. First, he stated that the only issue was as to whether or not we would deny the Government supplies pending a controversy between the House and the Senate touching $2.50 wheat. He again stated as the sole issue the question as to whether or not the Senate proposed to put the House under duress concerning $2.50 wheat.

Now, Mr. President, neither one of those is the real issue. The Senator is entirely in error if he understands my position to be either one of those two propositions. I feel certain that he misunderstands the position of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] and the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], both of whom have just interrupted the Senator. I should like to state just what the issue is.

Mr. MARTIN. I yield the floor to the Senator. I do not desire to stand here and listen to a long speech; but I will give up the floor, and the Senator can speak as long as he wants to, and then I will complete the remarks that I commenced some time ago.

Mr. GORE. I will not interrupt the Senator.

Mr. MARTIN. Go ahead. I am perfectly willing to have the Senator occupy the floor just as long as he wants to, if it is all day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oklahoma is recognized.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I think it is well enough at this juncture to state exactly what the issue is.

As just suggested by the Senator from North Dakota, the Senate on three different occasions has expressed its advocacy of and commitment to $2.50 wheat. That question was voted on early in April by the House. They rejected, by a slender majority, the proposition to pay $2.50 for wheat for the current crop. They did not vote on any other proposition—to fix the price, say, at $2.45, at $2.40, at $2.35, or at $2.30. The formal vote was taken on Monday last. The Senate voted, by a majority of 46 to 19, to refuse to instruct its conferees to recede from amendment numbered 44, that being the wheat amendment.

In order to facilitate the final action of the House on this measure I had prearranged a conference to take place immediately after the vote was announced on last Monday afternoon. As soon as the announcement was made from the Chair, I undertook to get into communication with the chairman of the House Committee on Agriculture. I was not able to locate him in his office or anywhere else. The conference, therefore, necessarily failed. Perhaps I ought to say, in behalf of the conferees of the House, that the vote in the Senate was not taken until about 5.30, and it proved impossible to hold a conference that afternoon or evening.

When I found that it was impossible to do so I called a meeting of the conferees for 11 o'clock Tuesday morning. Before the conference was to convene the chairman of the House committee called me up and requested that I postpone the conference until 4 o'clock Tuesday evening. I expressed a reluctance to do so, desiring the reports to be filed during the morning hour on Tuesday. The House chairman was insistent and suggested that he had special reasons for making the request. I asked him if his reasons related to the conference and the $2.50 limit. He answered that they did. Of course, I assured him then that I felt obliged to comply with his request.

The conference assembled at 4 o'clock Tuesday afternoon, and the request of the House chairman was renewed. He had not arrived at any proposition to tender the conference, but expressed some hope that he might be able to do so at 11 o'clock Wednesday morning without holding out any promise. It was merely a request for the further time. Out of deference to his request the Senate conferees felt obliged to adjourn until 10.30 Wednesday morning. Just before 10.30 Wednesday morning the chairman of the House committee, being obliged to attend the funeral of Senator TILLMAN, requested that the conference be again postponed. He suggested, however, that a disagreement was the only thing in sight. I then suggested, in view of that statement, that the other House conferees meet with the Senate conferees and that we report a disagreement. I was not willing to have any delay occur that could possibly be avoided. That action was taken, and on Wednesday we reported to the Senate a disagreement, and the Senate further insisted upon its adherence to amendment numbered 44. The papers were then messaged to the House, and it is in order to-day for the House to consider the $2.50 amendment.

I will say to the Senator that I have no disposition to withhold from the Government supplies for the Agricultural Department, the District of Columbia, or any other department. The Senator suggests, however, that he has heard no Senator or Congressman propose that we should recess before the Army conference report had been acted upon; that everybody appreciated the necessity of passing that bill. I assume, then, that the opposition has relation either to the Agricultural appropriation bill or to the District of Columbia appropriation bill. The Senator indicated that he had heard a proposal to recess, not without passing the Army bill, but——

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, I am compelled to interrupt the Senator to say that that is absolutely incorrect. I have said nothing of the sort, thought nothing of the sort, and heard nothing of the sort.

Mr. GORE. Very well. Of course, I accept the Senator's statement. I inferred it only from his statement that he had heard no Senator suggest that Congress should recess without passing the Army appropriation bill.

Mr. MARTIN. The Senator deduces from that that they will adjourn without passing the others. I said nothing of the sort.

Mr. GORE. Not at all; I certainly hope not, and they will not adjourn without passing the others if I can help it. That is exactly what I want. I want them to pass the Army appropriation bill, and, as suggested by the Senator, it would be criminal not to do so. I want them to pass the Agricultural appropriation bill. I do not mean to withhold supplies from the Government, however, even if they do not pass the Agricultural appropriation bill.

The amendment offered by the Senator requires this joint resolution to return to the House. I have previously suggested that the Agricultural bill be eliminated. There was, of course, the answer that that would occasion delay, as it would oblige the joint resolution to go back to the House. The joint resolution must go back to the House now. The Senator suggested indirection. I think the imputation was not well founded. If there is no indirection anywhere, then let us eliminate the Agricultural appropriation bill from this joint resolution, and if we reach an impasse between the two Houses, which we have not yet reached. I shall be as anxious as the Senator from Virginia to pass the continuing resolution to enable the Department of Agriculture to proceed with its essential operations. We can not afford to recess without that; but, Mr. President, it is not necessary to act this minute, nor to act this day, upon the pending joint resolution in order to supply the Agriculture Department.

The Senator says that we are guilty of some indirection, for this wheat controversy can proceed, I suppose, ad infinitum.

Now, Mr. President, in the abstract that might seem to be correct, but as a matter of fact it is not correct. The Senator has just moved to include this $2.50 wheat in this continuing resolution. The farmers and the dealers in wheat must know what is to be the price or else one of two things will happen, either wheat will not move in anticipation that possibly the two Houses may advance the price or if it does move and we have July and August passing by us, then when we meet on the 1st of December the wheat in several States will have been harvested and will have been sold in all probability. Those who are opposed to this resolution will then say we passed an amendment fixing the price at $2.50 when the crop had been harvested. I know, and the Senator from Virginia knows, that this contest will shrivel up in the shell if we are obliged to wait until the 1st of September for action. It is vital that we should act now.

Instead of being guilty of indirection, instead of a desire to withdraw supplies from the Government, instead of a desire to put the House under duress all we want is this: The House is in a situation to act to-day, certainly to-morrow. They can act to-day if they desire. Now, then, they must agree to one of three things. They can agree to $2.50; they can agree upon some price less than $2.50 to-day or to-morrow and message the papers back to the Senate. I believe the Senate would agree to any reasonable compromise. On the other hand, the House may refuse to make any concession whatever; it may insist upon its disagreement, and message that disagreement back to the Senate. The Senate can then take appropriate action; it can agree to the conference or it can move to adhere to its previous action guaranteeing $2.50 wheat. That is all I want. I want this thing to reach some act of final decision, which certainly can be arrived at to-day or to-morrow. It is final action that I want, and if we can not reach final action and the Senate shall move to adhere and the bill shall go back to conference to reach an agreement upon that proposition, I will join the Senator in passing a continuing resolution. I am as sensible as he is that we can not afford to adjourn without making provision for the Department of Agriculture. I think it is only a reasonable request when 46 out of 96 Senators expressed their position on this question, when we made every effort to secure an early report, when action can be had to-day or to-morrow, unless there is a filibuster against it, either to let this continuing resolution go over until to-morrow or for the Senator to agree to have the Agricultural appropriation bill to be stricken out of the joint resolution. If he will do that, so far as I am concerned, I shall interpose no further opposition to it, and will join him to-morrow when the impassé is reached in passing a continuing resolution, if no other solution be found for the present situation.

Now, I think that is a reasonable request. I appreciate the Senator's desire to pass the joint resolution now and to make provision for the Government. Unfortunately I may seem to be obstructing that, but I have here a matter which I know can be attended to to-morrow if it is not unreasonably obstructed. I am only asking for that time. I think that is a reasonable request. In any event, when the worst comes to the worst and there is no other way out, then I shall not object to a continuing resolution; but until every resource is exhausted to secure some final action on the wheat amendment, I do not think this resolution ought to pass including the Agricultural appropriation bill. That is the real issue between us.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, I may be mistaken, but I will ask the Senator a question. For three months this matter of the price of wheat was in conference. The Senator complained that they never could get a vote in the House. I am told that the reason why they could never get a vote in the House was because the Senate conferees would not sign the report of a disagreement. They could not get a report of the two Houses until a report came in.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, Senate bill 3220, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 3220) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to make investigations, through the Bureau of Mines, of lignite coals, to determine the practicability of their utilization as a fuel and in producing commercial products.

Mr. MARTIN. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be laid aside until we dispose of the joint resolution.

Mr. McCUMBER. I object.

Mr. MARTIN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House joint resolution 311.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Virginia moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House joint resolution 311.

Mr. GORE. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Beckham	Johnson, S. Dak.	Norris	Simmons
Borah	Jones, N. Mex.	Nugent	Smith, Ariz.
Chamberlain	Jones, Wash.	Overman	Smith, Md.
Culberson	Kellogg	Owen	Smoot

Dillingham	King	Phelan	Sutherland
Fletcher	Knox	Pittman	Swanson
France	Lenroot	Poindexter	Thomas
Gore	Lewis	Pomerene	Thompson
Hale	McCumber	Ransdell	Trammell
Harding	McKellar	Saulsbury	Underwood
Henderson	Martin	Sheppard	Vardaman
Hitchcock	Nelson	Sherman	Warren
Johnson, Cal.	New	Shields	Williams

Mr. JONES of Washington. I desire to announce that the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] is necessarily absent on account of illness in his family. I will allow this announcement to stand for the rest of the day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Fifty-six Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. FLETCHER. I believe the motion is debatable, but I am not going to debate it. I merely want to say that we are right in the midst of the consideration of a bill with only one amendment, I believe, to be acted upon, and it can be shortly finished. There was one amendment pending, and that was the only amendment that was to be offered, as I understand it. That amendment was under discussion when we adjourned. I do not believe it will take over 30 minutes—perhaps very little more time than that—to pass the bill. I believe it will pass and that we can get action on it quite soon. I should like very much if we could finish that bill. I do not want to oppose the important resolution which has been before the Senate. I realize its importance, and yet I wish the Senator from Virginia could see his way clear to let it go over until to-morrow, as has been suggested by the opponents of the resolution. I think it would facilitate matters really and we would get rid of the unfinished business.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I think the argument of the Senator from Florida is very conclusive. Undoubtedly, if the Senator from Virginia will consent that his motion to take up the joint resolution may be temporarily laid aside, we can dispose of the unfinished business to-day.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, my sole attitude in this matter is to discharge the public duty. There are three departments of the Government without a dollar of money. There is a large pay roll in all three of them. They have got to have it to-morrow or employees will go without money to do their week's marketing. This appropriation bill is vitally important, continuing the appropriations. I brought the joint resolution in here from a sense of duty. It is before the Senate, and the Senate will have to dispose of it just as the Senate sees fit. If the Senator wants to put it aside to take up a bill of much less consequence to the country, the responsibility is with the Senate. I submit the motion for the judgment of the Senate. If we do not wish to proceed to consider this vitally important matter, it is all right.

Mr. VARDAMAN. May I ask the Senator from Virginia if the appropriations have been made, passed by the House and Senate, for the departments covered by the joint resolution?

Mr. MARTIN. They have; and the bills are in conference.

Mr. VARDAMAN. What objection can there possibly be to the passage of the joint resolution?

Mr. MARTIN. I can not understand it.

Mr. VARDAMAN. The appropriations have already been made.

Mr. MARTIN. It is to put the other House under duress and to deny supplies to the Government until they agree to $2.50 wheat. The only effective result I can conceive of is to withhold supplies with the idea that the House in order to get supplies will yield its convictions in reference to the price of wheat.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator is mistaken if he thinks there is any purpose of duress on the part of Senators who are advocating a rise in the price of wheat. All we are asking for is that the House shall have an opportunity to express its voice upon the subject, and that the conferees on the part of the House will allow the House to do it. I want the Senator to remember that the House has never by a majority vote rejected this amendment.

Mr. MARTIN. The Senate conferees could have had a vote three months ago if they had desired it, I am sure.

Mr. McCUMBER. There is no reason why the conferees should prevent the House from having a vote. Remember, the Senate has voted three times, and twice at least by a majority of all the Senators. The House has never voted a majority against the Senate amendment.

Mr. MARTIN. It is withholding the supplies from the Government, stopping the pay of employees of the Government. This will not interfere with that, but it can go on and the House can have its vote regardless of the passage of this continuing resolution.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think the House will vote on it to-day or to-morrow.

Mr. MARTIN. They can vote just as well whether the joint resolution is passed or not. The passage of this joint resolution will not interfere with that opportunity. The House can vote as it sees fit. If the Senate does not wish to furnish the supplies to the Government in order that they may be carried on in an orderly way and those who work for it buy their marketing next Saturday, that is for the Senate to determine.

Mr. FLETCHER. I realize the importance of the joint resolution, and I am only suggesting that within 30 minutes or such a matter we will have the unfinished business out of the way, so that there will be unlimited time to deal with the joint resolution. If, however, the Senator from Virginia insists on his motion, all I can say is that if the unfinished business is displaced by the joint resolution I think in all fairness the Senate ought to return to the unfinished business next, and I shall ask to have that done.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I was hoping that we could find a solution of this matter, so that we could go on with the Senate's business. This is a motion after 2 o'clock to lay aside the unfinished business and proceed with the consideration of the joint resolution. That is open to full debate for any length of time. Undoubtedly it will take all the afternoon to debate that one motion whether it shall even be taken up. Then it will take hours again, undoubtedly, to debate the matter upon its merits. Much time could be saved, if we are attempting conscientiously to save time, by proceeding with the unfinished business and disposing of it, and possibly by the time we get a few bills disposed of the House will have acted upon this legislation and there will be no necessity for any further debate.

Mr. MARTIN. Of course, the debate can be prolonged in the nature of a filibuster. There is nothing to prevent it.

There is really nothing to debate. It is in the palm of your hand. Everybody knows what it is and everybody has his opinion about it. There is no occasion for debate. It is free from objection, but Senators can debate it interminably. I felt it was my duty to present this matter to the consideration of the Senate, so that the Government might have the money necessary to carry on its business. I think those who work for the Government during this week ought to have the money to-morrow at whatever hour the employees are paid. It is vital in all three departments.

The District Commissioners called me over the phone and said they were in a terrible fix about it, and they are all in the same fix. They all need the money to-morrow to meet their pay roll. The question is, Will the Senate give it to them or hold it up with the idea of compelling the House to vote on the price of wheat? That is all the controversy, and there is nothing else that can be gained by it.

Mr. NORRIS. May I ask the Senator for information about the pay of employees? Were they not paid at the end of the fiscal year, and will it not be the middle of the month before there will be another pay day for these employees?

Mr. MARTIN. I think a great many of them are paid weekly. Commissioner Brownlow called me up and told me he was in a serious condition on account of it.

Mr. NORRIS. They are not paid by the week.

Mr. MARTIN. I do not know; but Commissioner Brownlow told me that they have a pay roll to-morrow, and he wants the money and has not got it.

Mr. NORRIS. The clerks mostly are paid by the month. Some laborers may be paid weekly.

Mr. MARTIN. I do not know what it is. He said he had a pay roll to meet to-morrow and he had not the money and no way to meet it unless the joint resolution is passed.

Mr. NORRIS. Would the Senator object to changing the joint resolution as to the Agricultural Department, at least, because I do not believe there is anyone in that department who is paid except twice a month, and the next payment will be the middle of July?

Mr. MARTIN. That is for the Senate to determine. If the Senate wants to strike out the Agricultural Department from the joint resolution, it is its privilege to do it. I have nothing in the world to say about it except to cast my vote.

Mr. BORAH. If there is a pay roll to-morrow and it is not paid, if there is no money to pay it, it will be by reason of the fact that the pay roll for the District of Columbia has been harnessed up with a wholly different proposition, and those who are not willing for the other proposition to pass without some discussion will not assume any responsibility for that proposition. They can take the District of Columbia matter and pass it in 15 minutes.

Mr. MARTIN. It is up to the Senate to provide for the departments—three of them, two of them, one of them, or none of them, just as it chooses.

Mr. BORAH. It is up to the Senate to settle that, of course; but there is no reason why these three propositions should be inseparably connected. There is no pay roll, so far as the Agricultural Department is concerned, until the 15th of July.

Mr. MARTIN. I do not know about that. I have heard nothing from the Agricultural Department.

Mr. BORAH. Of course, I am not positive about that, but that is my understanding. But the other pay roll, which comes to-morrow night, can be disposed of in a very few minutes.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator from Virginia yield?

Mr. MARTIN. I yield.

Mr. POMERENE. If I may ask for information, this resolution involves the Agricultural bill, the District of Columbia bill, and, I understand, the Army appropriation bill?

Mr. MARTIN. That is correct.

Mr. POMERENE. May I not further ask, Does not the bill involve the payment for supplies as well as pay rolls?

Mr. MARTIN. It does.

Mr. POMERENE. And has the Senator information as to when it may be necessary to pay these bill for supplies?

Mr. MARTIN. The only information I have is a telephone message from Commissioner Brownlow that unless this resolution is passed to-day they will be very much embarrassed to-morrow for want of the money.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, if I may say a word, evidently there is a controversy on between the Senate and the House. If we will sweep our own doorsteps, I think we ought to permit the House to sweep its doorsteps. The House has passed this joint resolution in view of what they believe to be a contingency. Reference has been made to the provision in the Agricultural bill with respect to the price of wheat. It is not necessary to discuss that. The Senate has passed upon that, and I regret the Senate has taken a position which I do not approve; but for the time being that has been settled so far as the Senate is concerned. Certain legislation has come over from the House with respect to the Agricultural bill, the District of Columbia bill, and the Army bill. This is the attitude of the Senators who are opposing this resolution: They are not willing that the resolution shall pass upon its merits.

They are holding it up for the purpose of forcing the House to take action. Let us be perfectly plain about this matter. That is the situation, and there is no use in attempting to camouflage it. The purpose is to force the House to do something. Whether they are acting rightly or wrongly I do not know and I do not care, so far as the merits of this resolution are concerned. The passage of the resolution is not going to hurt anybody. The question with respect to the price of wheat will remain to be determined later, but it would seem from the course of the debate here that certain Senators are to hold up this very meritorious resolution in order that they can force action to their liking. That is the situation.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I desire to repeat that those of us who are interested in the part of the resolution which has to do with the Agricultural bill have no desire whatever to retard the passage of the resolution which would provide for the payment of employees or for any supplies which may be necessary for the District of Columbia. It is not a matter about which there need be any particular excitement. The resolution could be separated in five minutes instantly, and those matters which are not to be debated and no one desires to debate, and which really ought to be disposed of at once, could be disposed of immediately.

As to the other matter, if we should choose to take a couple of hours to express our views upon certain features of it I believe no harm will come from it, because the money under that appropriation bill will not be utilized, no part of it, for 10 or 15 days at most.

So, Mr. President, we are not interfering with anything which is important at all. We are perfectly willing that that which is pressing shall be disposed of. That which is not so pressing and not so necessarily urgent we want to express some views in regard to. That is the situation precisely.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Virginia to proceed to the consideration of House joint resolution 311.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, before that motion is put I want to ask the Senator from Virginia again if he will not consent, so as to avoid any lengthy debate, that we shall eliminate the Agricultural Department from the resolution, and thereby dispose of the other two matters. That could be done in a very few moments. If the Senator would do that I do not think there would be any objection to taking it up immediately. But of course if there is an intent and purpose to choke us into submission by maneuvering so as to carry this wheat amendment over until September, until the wheat is thrashed and a great portion of it is sold at the present prices, the Senator can understand that we who have our convictions would be recreant to our duty if we allowed a thing of that purpose to be accomplished.

We could dispose of the other matter to-day; and I believe by to-morrow we would be able to dispose of the agricultural proposition. Then we would have two things determined without any possible question, and if there was still left this other question at least there would not be the same inconvenience.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, it is a matter for the Senate to determine. I am not going to discriminate against the Agricultural Department. I am not going to ask that that be thrown down and turned out of doors and denied money to carry on its business. If the Senate wants to do that they have the opportunity. I am not going to ask that that be done, because I do not think it is right. I think we ought to supply the necessary funds for all the departments to carry on their ordinary operations, and that is what this resolution does.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, it is not a discrimination against the Agricultural Department. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] suggested that these departments have certain purchases they would have to make. I doubt if there are considerable purchases on the part of the Agricultural Department. I can not now think of anything that it must purchase. Certainly such purchases amount to very little.

With reference to the other department, the Department of War, of course there will be money paid for purchases as well as probably daily and weekly pay rolls, but there will be nothing to be paid by the Agricultural Department before the 15th day of July. Then, why not take this department out of the resolution and dispose of it?

Mr. MARTIN. Surely, the Senator does not mean to say that any department of the Government can run 15 days without a dollar of money. I have not had an accounting made, and I do not know what they will need in the Agricultural Department, but every other department needs money every day in the year, and I thought as they have not since the 1st of July been able to draw a warrant on the Treasury and have had no money we ought to provide that money.

Mr. McCUMBER. They have gotten along five days without it.

Mr. MARTIN. I think this debate on the price of wheat can go on, but I do not see any wisdom in the Senate putting the House under duress to compel the price of wheat. It is a question of denying money to carry on the Government. I can not see the justice of it, but it is for the Senate to determine. I have no interest in it more than any other Senator. I am going to vote my convictions, and every other Senator can do the same. If the Senate wants to deny money for the Agricultural Department, all right.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator thinks, then, that is duress and we are attempting to compel the House to do something they do not want to do?

Mr. MARTIN. I do; by denying the appropriation——

Mr. McCUMBER. That is a separate proposition.

Mr. MARTIN. By denying the appropriation you compel them to vote your views on the wheat question.

Mr. McCUMBER. I can not see anything in our objections to this resolution which compels the House to vote. The Senate has voted, and it has voted three times on the proposition, and voted by a very heavy majority in favor of $2.50 as the price of wheat. The House has never voted by a majority vote on that subject.

Mr. MARTIN. I have been assured that the reason why the House did not vote was that the Senate conferees refused to sign a report of a disagreement. It was the Senate conferees who refused to give them the opportunity that the House now has. It is said that by signing the report of a disagreement they could have had the report a month ago in the House.

Mr. McCUMBER. Does the Senator mean to tell me that the House can not vote on this to-day, if it wishes to do so?

Mr. MARTIN. They can do so now, because the report of disagreement has been sent to them; but it could not have been done until to-day.

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes; but it can be done now.

Mr. MARTIN. And they may have done it. I do not know. We are not responsible for them; we are responsible for our own action, and I think we ought to supply the Government what it needs to carry on its business.

Mr. McCUMBER. But, of course, the House can express itself on that question now.

Mr. MARTIN. Well, let them do it.

Mr. McCUMBER. They can do it to-day; they can do it to-morrow. The Senator from Virginia says, "Let them do it." That is what I want to do—to let them do it; but the Senator from Virginia wishes to prevent their doing it by passing the joint resolution here providing that we will accept their rejection of the amendment made some three or four months ago.

Mr. MARTIN. No, Mr. President; the Senator from North Dakota misstates my position.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think not.

Mr. MARTIN. I say the House can vote whenever it can reach the question; but we should not simply deny the supplies to carry on the Government in order to compel the House to do it when they do not want to do it.

Mr. McCUMBER. Well, Mr. President, we are simply insisting that they shall have the privilege of voting on this matter. Now, the Senator from Virginia would forestall that privilege by having the Senate back down from a position that it has voted upon three times, and voted by a majority vote of the Senate, while the House has never rejected the proposition by a majority of the Members of that body. That does not seem to me to be just; it certainly is not fair to the Senate, and is less fair to the country.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SMITH of Georgia in the chair). Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

Mr. LENROOT. I should like to have the Senator from North Dakota explain how the passage of this joint resolution would deprive the House of the privilege of voting upon the question.

Mr. McCUMBER. If there is a question in conference, and if the House has passed upon it at one time and rejected the Senate amendment, and the Senate now carries the matter over until such time as the Senate amendment will be no good to us, while you have not deprived the House of passing on it, at the same time you have rendered the matter unnecessary.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the Senator yield to me further?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. LENROOT. The matter of disagreement is before the other House at the present time, and the House can or can not, irrespective of this joint resolution, vote to-day or to-morow, or at any time it sees fit, upon that disagreement.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, the Senator from Wisconsin has been in Congress sufficiently long to fully understand every purpose of every step that has been taken in this case. When this matter was before us last spring, we stated on the floor that there would be an attempt to continue this matter over until the wheat was sowed, and then the opponents would come back at us with the argument, "Now you have got in all the wheat you are going to get in anyway, and there is no necessity for us to advance your price in order to secure the acreage." That was attempted; and I think a great many of the farmers, after the Senate had passed upon the proposition favorably to give them $2.50 a bushel for their wheat, felt that their cause was so very just that there would be little danger of its being defeated, and they proceeded to increase the acreage to the limit of their ability.

Hence, now, any delay until the middle of August or September may have its effect upon many of the Members, although probably not enough in the Senate to make any difference, who reason, as they intended we should reason, that inasmuch as we have got all the crop now that we can possibly get there is no occasion for the Government paying any more than it paid for the last year's crop. Well, there is rank injustice in that.

But, Mr. President, if the Senate is determined that we have got to take the three propositions together, that it will not eliminate the Department of Agriculture, of course we shall have to accept the gage of battle and do what we can to prevent the passage of this joint resolution at this time, because we know, the Senator from Wisconsin knows, and I know just exactly what it means and what its purpose is.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. McCUMBER. With pleasure.

Mr. KING. Does not the Senator from North Dakota see in the position which he has just taken, and particularly in the reply to the question propounded by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], that the Senator is trying to use the Senate as a club to compel the House of Representatives to accept $2.50 per bushel for wheat, and that the position of the Senator, should it succeed, must be regarded as an affront to the dignity of the House of Representatives?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. I see nothing of the kind whatever. I now yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. I was going to say that we do not apprehend for a moment that there will be any votes changed in the other House by reason of our action, but we do hope to have a vote in the other House. We think from every standpoint that it is proper that the matter should be voted upon. The House, as I understand, in all probability will reject the amendment, and of course anything we do here will not change a vote there, but they have it there before them to-day. We ask that this matter go over until such time as the House of Representatives shall have expressed themselves.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator from North Dakota pardon me for just a moment?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. KING. I do not see how the Senator from Idaho can couple our action with the action of the other House, other than as indicated by the question which I propounded to the Senator from North Dakota, namely, we are trying to use the method suggested by the Senator from North Dakota as a club to effectuate some legislation there which perhaps the House does not desire to enact.

Mr. BORAH. No, sir; it has nothing to do with that matter at all. The matter is now before the other House, and they will likely dispose of it to-day. We ask that this matter go over until they shall have disposed of it. We shall not control their action. It is there for action, and the probabilities are that they will take it up and dispose of it; but we say until that is done this joint resolution is not necessary to be passed upon in the Senate.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] is probably aware of the fact that the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture of the House is absent attending the funeral of the late Senator TILLMAN, and that probably nothing will be done until he returns. I assume that he will return at some time to-day, if he has not already returned.

Mr. GORE. I will say to the Senator that I am just advised by the Sergeant at Arms of the Senate, who came back with the chairman of the House Committee on Agriculture, that he is in the city. I have just been talking to Members of the other House who were not aware that the chairman had returned. I do not know that it is my business to account for that, but if there is no disposition to mark time anywhere, the matter can be acted upon in the House to-day.

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly, Mr. President; but the chairman of the committee would undoubtedly not want it taken up in his absence. If he has returned to-day, I see no reason why the House could not take the matter up to-day and dispose of it.

The Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] has suspicions that are not at all justified by the facts in this case. We are not attempting to coerce the other House into voting upon the question. I think the Senator must agree with me, however, that when the House failed only by a bare plurality of those present and probably a third or more not voting at all, the House never having expressed itself upon the Senate amendment by any majority vote, we have a right to ask, in view of the fact that the Senate has so positively expressed itself in favor of the amendment, that the House at least do us the courtesy to vote upon it again and see whether or not the House will stand by its conferees, or whether under the changed conditions it deems it best to yield upon its part. The matter has come to the Senate twice since it was in the hands of the conference committee. May it not go to the House once and be voted upon by the House? There is no use of Senators attempting to put us in the wrong position, for every Senator knows we are in the right upon our proposition. We have got the sentiment of the Senate in favor of it by nearly three to one.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LENROOT. I will say to the Senator from North Dakota that my inquiry was prompted by the fact that it was my understanding that the House would vote upon this proposition either to-day or to-morrow, irrespective of what may happen to this joint resolution; but if this joint resolution should not pass it might have a coercive effect upon the House, as to the way they should vote. In any event, however, it is not my understanding that the passage of this joint resolution will have any effect upon the question of whether or not the House shall vote, though it may have some effect upon the way the House may vote.

Mr. McCUMBER. Of course, it does not compel the House to vote or not to vote.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. GORE. The Senator put it in a nutshell, then. What I want is for the House to vote. We have no power to coerce the House and no disposition to do so, and could not do so if we tried.

The Senator knows that we can not make the House agree to $2.50 wheat if it does not want to do so, but that is not an open question. What we want, however, is a vote one way or the other.

When we reach an impassable barrier I think everybody will recognize it, and we shall act accordingly. If there is anybody in this Chamber who can give us the assurance that the House will vote on this $2.50 a bushel wheat amendment if this continuing resolution passes now before a recess is taken, and that the Senate will be in a mind to vote to consider whatever the House does, for my part this fight is over. I am afraid there is a disposition somewhere to pass this joint resolution and to let the wheat amendment die, to hold it over until the wheat crop is harvested and sold, or a large part of it. I do not want that to happen. I do not mean that that is the purpose of the Senator from Virginia; I do not think it is; but if the leader, the Senator from Virginia, can give us the assurance, or if anybody can give us the assurance, that the House will vote on the $2.50 wheat amendment before a recess is taken and that the Senate will be given a chance to vote on whatever they do, I think every advocate of the $2.50 wheat amendment will stop this contest now. That is all we want—a vote.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, will the Senator from North Dakota permit me to ask a question of the Senator from Oklahoma, the chairman of the committee?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN] has stated that the reason the House has not had an opportunity to vote on the question of $2.50 wheat is due to the refusal of the Senate conferees to give that opportunity. Now, what has the Senator to say in reply to that?

Mr. MARTIN. If the Senator will excuse me, so that I may not be at all misquoted, I said I had information to that effect, and that I had asked the question at least four or five times upon the floor of the Senate without getting an answer.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, the Senator will get an answer now. If the Senator means that he has information that the Senate conferees would not agree to report a disagreement, his information is correct, and his informant was entirely accurate. The answer is very simple; there is no mystery about it. The Senate suspended the rules to attach this amendment to the regular appropriation bill. Then it adopted the amendment, after suspending the rules, by a majority of 49 to 18. The majority of the Senate conferees not only were in favor of the amendment but they felt irrevocably bound by the solemn action of the Senate, an almost unprecedented action, involving a suspension of the rules and the adoption of the amendment by an overwhelming majority. A majority of the Senate conferees—and I was among them, and I take the responsibility—were not willing, after the solemn action of the Senate, to report back a disagreement, and by that action seem to invite an instruction to recede. The Senate had the power to instruct its conferees, and the leader of the majority in the Senate made a motion to instruct the Senate conferees to recede, but the Senate declined to do so. If the Senate had taken that action, of course, the conferees would have deferred to the Senate as their master, as they were obeying their master in refusing to recede; but, speaking for myself, and I believe for a majority of the Senate conferees, we were not willing to bring back a report of disagreement and by that means seem to invite the Senate to instruct us to recede. I may say that of course if I had known the Senate would adhere to its former action, I should have brought back such a report long ago; but I could not tell. The opinion was expressed that the Senate would instruct us to recede; that opinion was entertained by some at least, and I for one was not willing to invite instruction. Of course, as I have said, I should have obeyed the instruction if the Senate had given it.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, let me ask the Senator a question. I should like to ask him if he and the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] did not come to me and request me to introduce a resolution instructing the conferees to recede?

Mr. GORE. I will say that I did not request it, but I suggested it to the Senator as probably——

Mr. MARTIN. If there is any difference in that connection between "request" and "suggest" I never heard of it. Two of the conferees came to me, and, as I construed it, made a distinct request of me. I said, "You ought to do it; the Senate is not in a position to act upon it in the way proposed," but they had reached an impassable barrier and they wanted me to do it.

Mr. GORE. We had reached an impassable barrier so far as reaching an agreement was concerned, or so far as reporting a disagreement was concerned. The Senate conferees would not report a disagreement, and I concurred in their decision. I shall not play upon the difference between the word "suggest" and the word "request," but I did say to the Senator from Virginia that I thought such a motion was probably the only way out of it, or the only way out that I could see. I did not know but that the Senate would give the instructions and that would end it. If it had, we would have been through long ago; but I never was in favor of and never had any intention of voting for such a motion, and the Senator, of course, never thought that I had. I was not for it and did not vote for it, and any action looking to the rejection of $2.50 wheat must be made over my protest. That is not only my position now, but it has been my position all along. That is the reason I would not report back a disagreement. I did not know but that the Senate might instruct us to recede; and I was not going out of my way to invite such an instruction or to make it possible. I wanted the Senate to do it on its own account and in accordance with such a motion as that made by the Senator from Virginia here the other day, if it were to be made at all; a motion, of course, to which I objected. I thought then that it was the duty of the Senator from Virginia, as a majority leader, to make the motion; I think so now. It was his duty as a majority leader to set the machinery in motion to get some sort of action on the Agricultural appropriation bill. I am glad that he acted upon my suggestion, and, while I suggested the making of the motion, I had no purpose at any time, of course, of supporting the motion. The Senator from Virginia and the Senate perfectly understand my position in that regard.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I think we understand the parliamentary situation. After all, it is one touching the merits of the question. Those who are determined that the farmer shall be discriminated against, of course, would naturally vote for the proposition of the Senator from Virginia. We who believe that the farmer should be treated at least with a degree—a very little degree—of consideration, and that, after having fixed his price at about 30 or 40 per cent lower than it was under market conditions, we ought not at least further to discriminate against him, are opposed to the position of the Senator from Virginia.

All that those who represent farming communities have ever asked for the farmer is that you let him alone and let him take his chances; and if you drive the labor price up 300 per cent, so that it costs him 300 per cent more for his help, that at least you would do him the courtesy of allowing him to secure the market price for his product. That is all we have asked. You do not grant that; you do not give any consideration to that plea. You force him to fight for his life, to fight for his prosperity during this war, during the period in which you are sending the price of everything else skyward, and then with a legislative sledge hammer driving the price of his product downward.

Mr. President, I received a telegram, dated July 1, from a section of my own State, which reads as follows:

Hon. P. J. McCUMBER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Morning press reports deadlock on fixing price of wheat. On account of drought, our crop will not average more than seven or eight bushels, and must have rain soon to get that; which does not pay expenses. We believe that this is the condition in a large area of the State. Would suggest a fair investigation before final action. Notify other members of North Dakota delegation.

We have been hearing from the Agricultural Department that we will have an exceeding large crop of wheat. I have never known a time when the Agricultural Department did not overestimate the yield. I will not say that there may not have been times when they did not overestimate it, but if there have been such times they have never come to my knowledge.

I repeat, it is suggested that we will have an enormous crop this year. Why, Mr. President, the spring-wheat crop has not yet reached that state of maturity when the slightest guess can be made as to what it is going to yield. We know if we have not the straw we are not going to get the grain, but even when we have the straw we do not know that we are going to get the grain. Three days of a southwest wind coming from the warm sections of Texas will burn our crop up so as to make it worthless. Already we have had heat there as high as 102 degrees, but it happened to be at that period in the development of the grain when it did little damage. That, however, is no indication at all that there may not be very much damage done if another one or two or three such days should come during the month of July or before the crop is harvested. This same section has had two almost complete crop failures. I think they are entitled to some consideration, notwithstanding the fact of those failures; and when the Senate passed a bill saying to them, "Go ahead and put in your crop and we will see that you get $2.50 a bushel," when they pay $3.50 for the seed wheat, and when the legislature had to meet in order to pass a law that would enable the counties to bond themselves and take a seed-grain lien upon the crop, and the counties did bond themselves, and these enormous prices were paid and the grain was put in, I submit to the Senate that we ought not further to legislate against the interest of those who have, under such circumstances and conditions, responded to the call of the Government for an increased acreage and, if possible, an increased crop.

That is not all. I have here notices sent out by the Government calling the labor from the farm, asking for unskilled labor to come to the city and secure employment, promising them wages which would be fabulous compared to the wages the farmer's son could earn upon the farm. By offering those wages and by adopting a practice which allowed the contractor to get his profit on a cost-plus basis, which authorized him to make wages just as high as he wanted to make them, and thereby increase his profits, you have demoralized and disorganized the labor of the country and invited it away from the farm.

Some sections of the country may not have suffered particularly, but we are suffering to-day in the Northwest for the lack of farm labor. Our boys are being taken for the Army, and no one is coming to take their places. We can not give employment the year round, but we need a great number of laborers during the months of July, August, September, and October; but we can not get them short of $4 and $5 a day; and when they are hired for the harvest at that rate they spring upon us the rule the Government has adopted of eight hours, and say, "We will not work longer than eight hours; and, if you don't like that, pay us; we will lose a few days and go to the next man and get a few days' labor," although in the meantime the crop may be rotting in the shocks.

I wish that Senators could fully realize the real situation in the Northwest to-day so far as crops are concerned. We never can anticipate with any degree of accuracy there, as I have stated, what the farm product will be. We may get a fair crop or may not get a quarter of a crop. The farmer has everything in nature to contend against—tornadoes and hail, wind and storms, hot weather and wet weather, frosts and the heat, the chinch bug and the grasshopper, French weed and cactus, wild mustard and quack grass, and a thousand other enemies. Mr. President, he is compelled to battle against them all. If he succeeds, if victory crowns his vigilance, along comes the Government with its legislative hammer and drives his prices down 80 cents per bushel. The laborer will get his pay at the end of the week; the farmer may or may not get his. I can not go down and buy groceries and flour without paying for them; the merchant, the retailer, is sure of getting his pay; everyone is sure except the farmer, and he must take all the chances.

He is satisfied with taking all of the chances provided you give him the final chance of the open market. You answer, "We will not do that. There are more votes in the city than there are in the country; we will play to the ultimate consumer, and say: 'We are keeping down the prices of your meat and your bread; we are protecting you against the avaricious farmer'"; and possibly some of them may be lulled into satisfaction by these declarations. I can not imagine how they can be, however, when they pay their weekly bills for flour and meat, the price of which is affected so little by the price of the raw product of the farmer.

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] thought it was a crime to raise the price of wheat 30 cents a bushel to these ultimate consumers. Oh, what an offense that is! Thirty cents a bushel! That means, at 4½ bushels to the barrel, $1.35 difference upon a barrel of flour. One man consumes a barrel of flour a year. That is the per capita consumption in the United States. That means 11 cents a month. That means one-thirtieth of 11 cents, or about 3 mills, a day. Now, this man who is to pay 3 mills more a day for his flour is receiving to-day $10 where he received $3.50 before the war, and he does not work as many hours or as hard as he did before the war; and I want to put it up to this ultimate consumer: "Do you not honestly believe that under conditions in which the price of your labor has been increased 300 per cent, you can afford to pay 15 per cent more for your flour?" Mr. President, I think he can; and I think it is unjust, worse than unjust, for us under conditions of this kind to take the farmer by the throat and say: "Notwithstanding the fact that we have increased the cost of the production of wheat from 100 to 300 per cent, nevertheless we refuse to allow you to raise your prices even 15 per cent."

The Government as it is constituted to-day has repeatedly declared through the administration that it proposes to see that every business man shall have a full, fair opportunity to make a reasonable profit. It declares that it will see to it that every laborer shall have employment, and at exceptionally high wages. Am I asking too much, then, if I ask the Government to say: "Inasmuch as we have guaranteed the higher profits and the higher wage to every one and every line of business, we will allow you, the farmer, to raise the price of your product to such an extent that you may meet these extra costs which you are compelled to incur in producing your wheat?" That is all that the farmer is asking.

Mr. President, I know that the farmer has been regarded simply as a sort of a necessary factor in the economic world. It is thought by a great many that the Lord created him in order that he might furnish food for the rest of humanity, and that if he furnished that he ought to be satisfied with the good he is doing in the world. So we flatter him concerning his vocation. "What an independent and beautiful vocation it is, out in the sunshine, under the blue sky, surrounded by singing birds, perfectly independent of everybody and everything!" "Well," he says, "possibly, then, if I am so independent, you will not object to paying me 15 cents more a bushel for my wheat, so that I may have a few dimes to spend for the moving pictures the same as you have." "Oh, no; we can not grant you such privileges as that. You are a farmer only. You are not expected to have the opportunities that we in the urban districts enjoy. You go right ahead as a good fellow and produce what we want to eat and be satisfied that you are allowed to live in this world."

That has been the attitude of the American people of the urban districts toward the rural districts, and we have plodded along in our slow and easy way, carrying the burden of the world. We have fed the sluggard and we have fed the industrious, and we have been allowed to make a very bare living. Now, I have been pleading for years with the Government, whose function and whose duty it is so to legislate as to give every important vocation an equal opportunity, to take into consideration the interests of the farming public. It has failed to do it so far, Mr. President.

Does any Senator deny the fact that farming in the United States ought to be sufficiently prosperous so that the farmer could conduct his business exactly the same as the merchant or the banker conducts his business? Does any one deny the fact that if the banker will pay his son $150 a month for clerking in his bank and his daughter $100 a month as his stenographer the farmer ought to be allowed at least to pay his son $50 a month to work 16 hours a day and that his wife, who does more work than any cook in the United States ever attempted to do, should be allowed the little sum of $20 a month and her board—less than you pay any colored cook in the city of Washington? Does any one deny that the farmer's business ought to be so prosperous that he could pay his daughter for helping the mother at least $10 or $15 a month? And yet, Mr. President, up to the present time if the farmers of the United States should pay for their help what you have to pay here in the city of Washington or elsewhere, or even one-half of it, there would not be one of them that would not be bankrupt at the end of the year.

There was a little opportunity that the farmer might secure something approaching justice during this war, which has created an exceptionally strong demand for his products. You foresaw that, however, and the war had no sooner begun than your first effort was to get the farmer by the throat and hold his prices down, while the prices of everything around him increased. His labor price soared from 200 to 300 per cent, his machinery from 150 to 200 per cent, and every shirt and every suit of clothes that he buys has increased 200 per cent.

Mr. President, the farmer is not asking very much in reference to this joint resolution. He is simply asking that those Members of the House, more than 150 of whom did not vote at all upon the question of whether or not his price might be raised by the Government 30 cents a bushel, shall be allowed to vote before you finally pass judgment against him. He wants you to defer your execution until there has been submitted to the House again the justice of his demand. Why, since the House voted upon this subject the price of labor has increased more than 25 per cent, and everything that the farmer must buy has increased more than 40 per cent. Why not, then, allow the House to pass judgment as to whether it believes that the farmer should have a 25 per cent raise upon what the Government has seen fit to offer him for his product?

I know a great many will say that the farmer does not spend as much as the man in the city, and therefore he does not need to earn as much. That is just where the pernicious ingredient creeps into this proposition. Why does not the farmer spend as much? Because he has not got it to spend. You can go to a dentist, and if he charges you a hundred dollars to look after one tooth, you get it looked after. The farmer can not pay such prices; he has to pull his tooth out if it aches. You can pay big prices for doctors' bills. The farmer has to carry his appendix, pain or no pain, because he has not got the two or three thousand dollars to pay for a specialist. You can pay $4 a seat to go to the theater to listen to a grand opera. The farmer can not afford to pay 50 cents to go. Now, Mr. President, I wish that we could so disarrange present conditions that the farmer could take his family to a moving-picture show or to the theater, the same as you and I can take ours if we see fit; and I think it is an unjust discrimination, when conditions point in that direction, for you to say: "No; that will cost our people too much. It will cost some of them 11 cents a month, and possibly it would keep them one night away from the moving pictures; and we can not stand for any such infringement upon the rights of our urban population."

I wish Senators understood the real farming situation throughout the grain-raising sections of the country. Mr. President, in 1912, the Secretary of Agriculture made a report of the net farm earnings throughout the United States, and he took each farm, and after making allowances which he thought were proper he arrived at the conclusion that each farm paid, net, $318; that is, over the actual expenses. Now, there are an average of five—that is, five persons on the average—who are doing the work of adults, because, as I have stated before, the girl 13 years old upon the farm performs about as much labor as her mother. The boy 15 years old will follow the binder, shocking all day long, and keep up with his father. Now, on the basis of five for each farm, you will find that the average earnings were about $5 a month. That meant 20 cents a day, and with that net of 20 cents a day the farmers and the farm wives and the farm children must buy all of their clothes, must support their churches, must pay their doctors' bills, and all of the thousand other little expenses upon 20 cents a day. They are not making any more to-day, if you will make due allowance for the cost of help and the higher cost of everything that the farmer must purchase.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. GORE. Would it interrupt the Senator if at this juncture I had read two letters which will shed a good deal of light on that subject?

Mr. McCUMBER. I shall be very glad to have them read.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I send to the desk a letter, which I ask to have read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there any objection to its being read? The Chair hears none, and it will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

ENID, OKLA., June 29, 1918.

Hon. T. P. GORE.

DEAR SENATOR: I see you are still endeavoring to get the price of wheat raised to $2.50 per bushel, so I inclose cutting from yesterday's Enid Daily News. You will please note wheat is quoted at $1.95, corn at $2, and oats $1.10. These are our country's three leading cereals, and before the war generally sold at a ratio of 1, 2, 3, which would make wheat now worth about $3.50. I can not see the reason for anyone to oppose your $2.50 price. Can not our Government be more reasonable and fair with the wheat grower? Is it reasonable or just for the Government to ask or expect the wheat grower to sell wheat at a less price than corn and then buy corn to feed his stock to save the wheat for human use?

When the price of wheat was cut a year ago, the wheat raiser had to take less than $2 for wheat, and if he used it for feed it cost $2.50 per bushel. As a result corn went on the table and wheat in the trough. I do not believe that a just man would ask or expect a wheat raiser to sell wheat at a price less than corn and buy corn to feed his stock, yet it seems that is what the wheat grower is expected to do.

Yours, respectfully,

——— ———.

Mr. GORE. I will ask the Secretary kindly to omit the name. It is a perfectly proper letter, but there is no need of putting the name in the RECORD.

I now send to the desk another letter to which I invite the especial attention of the Senate. It is a farmer's cost sheet, prepared with a great deal of care.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ASHURST in the chair). The Senator from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent to have a letter read by the Secretary. Is there objection. There being no objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

THE LUCKNOUGH ORCHARD CO.,
Sandy Spring, Md., July 3, 1918.

DEAR SIR: The farmers of Montgomery County, Md., take the view that wheat can not be produced at a profit if sold at the price set by the Government. In bearing out this contention, we submit figures showing that the advanced cost of labor, seed, fertilizer, harvesting, and other incidental expenses entering into the production of this crop fully warrant consideration for increasing the price of wheat to at least $2.50 a bushel. Our estimates show conclusively that wheat in this State cost on an average of $1.80 per bushel to produce.

Representatives of the Farmers' Club of Sandy Spring, the Enterprise Club, the Montgomery Club, and Olney Grange, comprising the ownership of about 100 of the most fertile farms in Maryland, recently held a meeting and compiled estimates of the average cost of raising wheat per bushel to the acre. The average yield in this section has been 20 bushels to the acre.

COST OF PRODUCTION PER ACRE.

Plowing	$5.00
Preparing land	2.50
Seeding with drill	.85
Seed wheat (1½ bushels)	3.90
Fertilizer (500 pounds per acre at $36 per ton; one-half charged to wheat crop)	4.50
Hauling fertilizer from station	.50
Cost of lime applied once in four-year rotation ($6 per acre charged to wheat)	1.50
Cutting and shocking	2.00
Binding twine	.50
Hauling to barn	1.50
Thrashing	2.40
Marketing	2.00
Interest on land valued at $100 per acre	6.00
Insurance (fire)	.16
Taxes on land	.46
Interest and taxes on equipment	2.50
Total cost of production per acre	36.20

In estimating the cost of production at $1.80 per bushel, no charge was made for the time of owner or manager, nor allowance for damage.

In presenting the foregoing figures the representatives of the above-named farmers' organizations respectfully invite your earnest consideration of the subject, and urge that you use your influence to secure such legislation as will warrant the production of this important food crop at a price which will at least be fair and reasonable to both producer and consumer.

WILLIAM FRANCIS THOMAS.

Mr. McCUMBER. That comes from one of the very best counties in the State of Maryland, a county that has always been noted for its excellent productivity year after year. There are some sections of the country where the cost would be considerably more, and some of them where it probably would be less, per acre. In my own State, of course, the cost per acre would be less, but the yield would be very much less than the estimate from this county in Maryland.

Here is the situation that has been created: The price of all products depends mainly upon the cost of labor used in their production. In some instances the cost of the raw material is equal to, and in some instances it is a little more than, the cost of the labor; but as a rule labor makes about 65 to 70 per cent of the cost. Now, you raise the price of labor, and that necessarily raises the price of the product. If that product is one that all the people must purchase, including the labor, that will increase the cost of living. The increase of the cost of living requires you again to raise the price of labor, and that again increases the cost of living; and so with this jackscrew process we have been pressing the price of commodities upward and upward and upward, and it has affected everything but the product of the farm. Now, the farmer says: "Inasmuch as you, by this process of increasing the cost of production, are always raising wages, and with the wages raising the cost of the thing that I must buy, I ask the opportunity to raise the price of my product to correspond." But along comes the Government, and says: "No; we can not allow you to do that. That will be too much of a burden upon our consumers."

Mr. President, I do not think the Senate is doing itself justice in allowing 33,000,000 of the American people to be discriminated against in this way. All we are asking of the ultimate consumer is this: Are you willing that we shall have an advanced price for our product that will measure the advanced price of the labor which you furnish which is necessary for that product? I think we ought to do it, Mr. President. I do not think the Senator from Virginia ought to press this joint resolution upon the Senate at this time.

Mr. President, we are talking all the time about the "back to the farm" movement, and we have appointed commissions that were to investigate the subject and see how they could make farm life more attractive. They investigated everything but the right thing. There is just one way to make farm life more attractive, and that is to make farm life more remunerative. Give the farmer the opportunity to earn more, and he will find a way of making his life more attractive on the farm, just exactly as you do in the city. The only way to allow him to make more is, in this war period at least, to give him the free world market in which to sell his product.

The Senator called attention in one of the letters just read to the fact of oats being worth $1.10 a bushel. Wheat is worth, then, about, we will say, $2.20 a bushel. Will any of you philosophers kindly explain to me why it is that with oats at $1.10 a bushel you have got to pay higher for your oat flour than you have to pay for your wheat flour at $2.20 a bushel, or just double? Yet that is exactly what you are doing. With your corn selling generally about two-thirds of the price of wheat, you are paying very much more for corn meal than you are paying for wheat flour. Will one of the Senators who understand the working of the Food Administration explain to me how this is possible?

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GORE. I will say to the Senator the letter which he referred to has a newspaper clipping attached from the Enid News, Okla., which quoted corn the day the paper was published at $2 a bushel and wheat at $1.95 a bushel. Yet for 30 years corn has averaged 61 per cent the price of wheat.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, taking it altogether, it seems that we have labored diligently in order to discriminate against the wheat producer, and we have succeeded wonderfully well. We are not complaining. We have been used to this treatment for a good many years and have labored through in some way. But we believe that you have about reached the limit of your injustices, and you are not going to put a further injustice upon us without at least a struggle upon our part that those of the House who represent farming communities may have one opportunity in the month of July to vote upon the proposition as to whether or not the House shall agree or the Senate shall recede from its $2.50 wheat proposition. That is all I have to say on the motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Virginia to proceed to the consideration of House joint resolution 311.

Mr. GORE. I make the point of no quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hitchcock	Martin	Smith, Ariz.
Chamberlain	Hollis	Myers	Smith, Ga.
Culberson	Johnson, Cal.	New	Smith, Md.
Cummins	Johnson, S. Dak.	Norris	Smoot
Dillingham	Jones, N. Mex.	Nugent	Sterling
Fernald	Jones, Wash.	Overman	Sutherland
Fletcher	Kellogg	Phelan	Swanson
France	Kendrick	Pittman	Thomas
Gore	King	Poindexter	Thompson
Guion	Lenroot	Pomerene	Trammell
Hale	Lewis	Ransdell	Underwood
Harding	McCumber	Saulsbury	Vardaman
Henderson	McKellar	Sheppard	Williams

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-two Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I hardly expected to occupy any further time of the Senate in the discussion of this question, but it is of such vital importance to the wheat growers of the Northwest and my own State that I can not forego adding something to what has already been said very ably by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] and by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE], the Senator in charge of the Agricultural appropriation bill.

I was struck by what was said by the Senator from North Dakota in connection with the telegram which he had read relative to the damage already done to the wheat crop in his State by the dry, hot weather. I am in receipt of a letter this morning from a constituent living in the western part of my State—that is, in that western part which is yet east of the Missouri River—in which he described the unfavorable conditions of the last few days prior to the writing of the letter.

From reports that I had previously received from South Dakota there was a prospect of the greatest wheat crop in the history of the State, but, according to this letter, the weather conditions have been so adverse during the last few days that the crop is cut short materially already, and it is yet a few weeks until harvest time for that section of the State. I have looked at the map of my State to see what other regions or counties were probably affected by like weather conditions as those described in the letter received. I find, Mr. President, that there are 12 counties lying, for the most part, west of the ninety-ninth meridian west longitude and east of the Missouri River, all of which are very likely to be similarly affected to the county in which my correspondent lives. That, Mr. President, is vital to the very question we are discussing. Instead of a prospect of 20 or 25 bushels per acre of wheat the prospect to-day, some weeks before the harvest time in that district, is for not more than 7 or 8 bushels per acre.

Take into consideration, now, the cost of producing it. That cost is as great for the production of 8 or even 5 bushels per acre as it is for the production of 20 or 25 bushels per acre. The cost of harvesting is just as great, of course, because there would be practically the same yield of straw, the same amount of straw to handle, as though the yield of wheat had been greater, and yet in all this cost, which is a greatly increased cost over the cost of prior years, the farmer will produce a half or less than half of the crop.

So from the mere standpoint of the farmer's returns, and as to whether he will be able to live and prosper or not, or live, let alone prosper, the question is a serious one under these conditions.

That is the one great difficulty in regard to the wheat crop. Up until the binder is ready to go into the harvest field it is largely speculative, and it may not be determined until the very eve of harvest as to whether there will be much to harvest or not.

Mr. President, I want to comment a little upon the price of wheat as guaranteed by the law of 1917, the so-called food-control act. Do you know, Mr. President, that when the administration fixed $2.20 per bushel for wheat, as it has done for the 1918 crop as against a guaranteed price of $2 per bushel, that it was not a concession to the farmer upon the part of the Government over and above the minimum price which had been fixed by statute? It would, however, be a great concession on the part of the farmer to accept and take $2.20 per bushel. And why is that so, Mr. President? It is so for the simple reason that with a guarantee of $2 per bushel as the minimum price there went the implied guarantee of all that the market would give or all the farmer might receive under the law of supply and demand over and above that $2 per bushel.

Mr. President, we have heard it stated many times, and I do not think there is any question in regard to it, that the market price of wheat now if not interfered with by law or by the Food Administration would be far in excess of $2.50 per bushel, and would probably be $3 per bushel.

So, Mr. President, conceding that the farmers of the country are satisfied with the $2.50 per bushel as provided by the Gore amendment to the Agricultural appropriation bill, that is a concession under the law on the part of the wheat producers of the United States. Any price which they say will be satisfactory to them below the market price of wheat to-day is a concession on the part of the wheat grower, and this because of the effect of the guaranty under the law.

It is true, Mr. President, that section 14 of the law of 1917 gives the President the power to fix and name a guaranteed price for wheat for the purpose of stimulating the production of wheat, but that guaranteed price the President is authorized to prescribe is a guaranteed minimum price. But that guarantee of a minimum price which the President is authorized to make does not pertain to the 1918 crop. The minimum price as fixed for that crop by Congress was $2 per bushel, and I can not help but think, Mr. President, that any attempt to fix the price to the farmer less than the market price is, though not intentional, of course, like a breach of faith upon the part of the administration, simply because it violates the plainly implied guaranty.

Mr. President, as I had occasion to say the other day, wheat at the price of $2.50 per bushel is about the cheapest commodity on the market, at least among the commodities which may under the food-control law be classed as necessaries. It is the great essential necessary produced on the farm to supply our own needs and the needs of our allies and it was to stimulate the production of this necessary that we passed this legislation authorizing in general terms the fixing of a guaranteed price by the President, but ourselves fixing the guaranteed minimum price of $2 per bushel for the 1918 crop, which guaranty extends until May 1, 1919.

Mr. President, we have been attempting by the Gore amendment to fix the price for the crop of 1918 notwithstanding the plain implication that the farmer and wheat grower should receive the market price over and above the minimum price thus fixed, and in view of the market price we are making a great concession. We fixed the 1917 price, or the Food Administration did, at $2.20 per bushel. That may be said to have been done under the first part of section 14, which authorized the President for the purpose of stimulating the production of wheat to from time to time seasonably and under specified conditions fix a reasonable guaranteed price for wheat, but that pertains alone to the 1917 crop, and the 1917 crop has been disposed of, and the price fixing for that crop can no longer be a question at issue. We are limited in our inquiry to-day and upon this bill to what may be justly done in the matter of price for the 1918 crop. In other words, what price less than the market price will or ought to be acceptable to the wheat growers of the United States? It was to this condition and situation I wish to direct attention.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, I did not wish to interrupt the Senator unless it was agreeable to him to discontinue, but I was going to make a request for unanimous consent.

Mr. STERLING. I yield to the Senator from Virginia for the purpose of making the request.

Mr. MARTIN. It is perfectly manifest that it will be impossible to get a vote on the joint resolution this evening, perhaps not until after the House votes. At any rate, it will be impossible to get a vote this evening; I am satisfied of that, and I think it is useless to hold on under those circumstances. It is just annoying Senators without accomplishing any result. I ask unanimous consent that the joint resolution be laid aside until 12 o'clock to-morrow, and that it be then taken up and proceeded with. I will put it in that shape because it is not now before the Senate. There is a motion to proceed to its consideration, and I want the unanimous consent to cover making it the business before the Senate at 12 o'clock noon to-morrow. I ask unanimous consent that that order may be made.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, according to my advices the House will vote on this proposition early to-morrow after they assemble. There is certainly no reason why they should not do so. All I desire is to have a vote before this matter comes to final action in the Senate. I am anxious to facilitate the business of the Senate. There are only two limitations implied in connection with the present possibility of having a vote on the wheat amendment in the House and action here. I am willing to cooperate with the Senator from Virginia and others for the purpose of speeding the legislation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Virginia asks unanimous consent that the pending motion shall be considered at 12 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. MARTIN. That it be laid aside and the joint resolution be taken up to-morrow when the Senate convenes at 12 o'clock and be proceeded with.

Mr. STERLING. In view of what we have heard to-day in regard to the House taking up the matter and voting on it, would not the Senator put the hour to take it up later than 12 o'clock?

Mr. MARTIN. I would not object to making it 1 o'clock.

Mr. STERLING. Would not the Senator make it 2 o'clcok?

Mr. MARTIN. I think the House will act on it this evening, or as soon as they assemble to-morrow. That is my information.

Mr. McCUMBER. Would not the Senator be willing to make it 2 o'clock, and then we would know more definitely, at least?

Mr. MARTIN. I think if Senators who have occupied the time need any further time to-morrow they can occupy it then. I want to be ready to proceed as early as possible to-morrow and vote on it. I do not see any occasion for occupying the time. Of course we understand that there is a filibuster.

Mr. McCUMBER. I do not understand that.

Mr. MARTIN. I suggest 1 o'clock, and the Senate can take it up at 1 o'clock and proceed with its consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request?

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I listened to a conversation between two Senators, and I do not want this to get into a situation where it may not be debated to-morrow. I understand the motion of the Senator from Virginia is to take up the joint resolution to-morrow and proceed with it. It would then be subject to debate and consideration as it is now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It would be subject to debate just as it has been.

Mr. MARTIN. Of course.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is nothing in the request for unanimous consent that contemplates any suspension or curtailment of debate whatever. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. STERLING. I suggest as a compromise between 1 o'clock and 2 o'clock that the hour be made 1.30.

Mr. MARTIN. I was acting on the idea that Senators wanted to recess to-morrow evening, and I was trying to get an opportunity to dispose of business and have a recess. It is of no consequence to me personally. I have no particular desire to recess; I am so near my home that it is entirely immaterial; but in deference to the wishes of Senators favorable to a recess to-morrow for perhaps 30 days I was trying to prepare the way for that situation, and I thought that the House would perhaps act when it meets to-morrow.

Mr. STERLING. Of course I do not pretend to speak for others, but my impression is that there will be very little debate when the joint resolution is submitted.

Mr. MARTIN. The joint resolution will lead to further debate?

Mr. STERLING. Yes, sir.

Mr. MARTIN. Then the debate ought to go on this evening. I was proceeding on the idea that the debate was over.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I think the Senator from Virginia misunderstood the Senator from South Dakota. He said there would be very little debate.

Mr. MARTIN. I thought he said there would be considerable debate.

Mr. STERLING. No; very little debate to-morrow when the resolution is taken up.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is it understood that it shall be taken up at 12 o'clock?

Mr. MARTIN. I am willing to make the hour 1 o'clock.

Mr. SMOOT. Do I understand that this is simply a notice, or is a unanimous-consent agreement asked?

Mr. MARTIN. A unanimous-consent agreement that to-morrow at 1 o'clock the joint resolution shall be taken up and proceeded with.

Mr. SMOOT. It would require then a roll call.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No; the Chair thinks not.

Mr. MARTIN. It is just to take up the joint resolution for consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It does not propose to fix a time for a vote.

Mr. GORE. It does not come within the rule requiring a roll call.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the unanimous-consent agreement is made.

INVESTIGATION OF LIGNITE COALS.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I desire now to have the unfinished business laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3220) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to make investigations, through the Bureau of Mines, of lignite coals, to determine the practicability of their utilization as a fuel and in producing commercial products.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending amendment proposed by the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 1, line 10, it is proposed to strike out "$100,000" and to insert "$150,000."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, when this measure was before the Senate prior to our adjournment the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] was addressing the Senate in opposition to it. He has not answered to the roll call to-day. I am not calling this matter to the attention of the Senate because of that fact, but the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] desires to discuss this bill and is suffering this afternoon from a very severe headache, to which he is occasionally subject. Under the circumstances, I shall ask the Senate to adjourn.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. SIMMONS. I hope we shall not adjourn, because, if the unfinished business is laid aside, I desire to have the bond bill taken up, although I do not desire to antagonize the unfinished business.

Mr. THOMAS. Then I suggest to the Senator to ask that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

Mr. FLETCHER. I object to that, Mr. President. We ought to go on with the unfinished business. It was agreed the other day when we took the adjournment that this bill would be disposed of the next day. The Senator from New York said at the time that he only desired a few minutes more in which to discuss it. He is not in the city to-day, but that is not any reason for postponing action on the bill, and the Senator does not ask it.

Mr. THOMAS. I have not asked a postponement for that reason, but I know of no agreement that the bill should be taken up and a vote had upon it on the next day. If there were such an agreement it has not been carried out, because we adjourned the next day for an unfortunate reason.

Mr. FLETCHER. The unfortunate death of the late Senator TILLMAN caused us to adjourn, that is all; but I think the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] will not insist on having the matter postponed.

Mr. THOMAS. Of course, the Senator from Utah is here to speak for himself; but I am satisfied he is not in proper condition to address himself to this measure or to any other measure this afternoon.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. If, however, he wants to go on, of course I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. KING. When this matter was up for consideration, I think the day before the death of Senator Tillman was announced, the Senator from New York was occupying the floor. I stated at that time to the Senator from Florida that, so far as I was concerned, I had no desire to prevent the Senate voting upon this measure after it had been fully considered; that I knew of no one who desired to speak, except the Senator from New York and myself; that there might be others, but I could not state; that, so far as I was concerned, I would submit what observations I cared to submit on the following day; and that after I had concluded I should be willing to vote. Of course, I could not speak for others. I will say, however, to the Senator from Florida that it would be almost impossible for me to proceed to-day because of my physical condition. I should be very glad if the Senator from Florida would consent that the Senator from North Carolina should have the bond bill taken up, which is quite important, and upon the conclusion of the bond bill that this measure then receive attention. I know there is no disposition on the part of anybody to filibuster or to prevent a vote upon the pending measure. Of course, if the Senator refuses, I can only submit.

Mr. THOMAS. I think the request of the Senator from Utah is very reasonable, and, if it is granted, I certainly shall interpose no further objection to a vote upon the bill. I therefore, Mr. President, ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business go over until to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Colorado asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside until to-morrow.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Why not merely lay it aside temporarily and, when we get through with the other bill, take it up again?

Mr. THOMAS. Because that would not meet the difficulty.

Mr. FLETCHER. I understand the request of the Senator from Utah to be that the bill be temporarily laid aside, in order to dispose of the bond bill, and I regret exceedingly to be put in that position, because we lost the opportunity to have action on the unfinished business the other day by consenting to an adjournment earlier, with the understanding that we would dispose of it the next day.

Then intervened the providential occurrence for which, of course, nobody is responsible, and we were deprived of the opportunity to take the bill up on that day. We have laid the bill aside from time to time to consider other matters. It is really an important measure, and I should like to have it disposed of.

I am, of course, in sympathy with the condition in which the Senator from Utah finds himself, and out of deference to that situation, in the hope that the bond bill will take only a short time, and that we can then resume and dispose of the unfinished business to-day, if possible, or as soon as we can, I am willing to lay it aside temporarily for the purpose of considering the bond bill.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I can assure the Senator from Florida that we will make progress by granting the request which the Senator from Utah has made.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Colorado yield to me?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. STERLING. I merely wish to say that as one who is very much interested in the lignite-coal bill I should be delighted to see it taken up and considered now, but I do not want to press it against a matter of inability of some Senator to proceed. I did not quite understand the situation that led to the asking that the bill be laid aside temporarily.

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], who desires to address himself to the bill, is physically unable to do so. He is suffering from a severe headache and is unable to proceed this afternoon.

Mr. FLETCHER. I do not understand that the Senator from Utah requests that the bill be laid aside for the entire afternoon, but that it be laid aside until the bond bill is disposed of, and that by that time the Senator hopes he will be able to proceed, and I also hope so.

Mr. STERLING. I merely desire to say, Mr. President, that it is impossible to resist a request such as that which has been made by the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] under the circumstances in which he makes it.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I simply desire to say that when I made the suggestion I really did not understand what had been stated by the Senator from Utah. I should not, of course, under those circumstances have desired the bill to be proceeded with until the Senator is ready to address himself to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside? There being no objection, the bill is temporarily laid aside.

FOURTH LIBERTY BOND ACT.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 12580, being what is known as the fourth liberty bond bill.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I suggest that the Senator from North Carolina ask unanimous consent to take the bill up, because if it be taken up on motion and not disposed of to-day it might be held to displace the unfinished business; and I do not think that is the intention of the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the bill were taken up on motion and remained under consideration at the close of the session, it would undoubtedly displace the unfinished business.

Mr. SIMMONS. It is not my intention that it shall displace the unfinished business. I thought, however, that the unfinished business had been temporarily laid aside.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I suggest to the Senator from North Carolina that I think he does not mean to make a motion to proceed to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. SIMMONS. If that would have the effect to displace the unfinished business, under the circumstances suggested by the Chair, and the Chair thinks it would have that effect, then I ask unanimous consent that we proceed to the consideration of the bill I have named.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from North Carolina?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 12580) to authorize an additional issue of bonds to meet expenditures for the national security and defense and for the purpose of assisting in the prosecution of the war, to extend additional credit to foreign Governments, and for other purposes.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 1 of the second liberty bond act, as amended by the third liberty bond act, is hereby further amended by striking out the figures "$12,000,000,000" and inserting in lieu thereof the figures "$20,000,000,000."

SEC. 2. That section 2 of the second liberty bond act, as amended by the third liberty bond act, is hereby further amended by striking out the figures "$5,500,000,000" and inserting in lieu thereof the figures "$7,000,000,000."

SEC. 3. That notwithstanding the provisions of the second liberty bond act, as amended by the third liberty bond act, or of the war-finance corporation act, bonds and certificates of indebtedness of the United States payable in any foreign money or foreign moneys, and bonds of the War Finance Corporation payable in any foreign money or foreign moneys exclusively or in the alternative, shall, if and to the extent expressed in such bonds at the time of their issue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, while beneficially owned by a nonresident alien individual, or by a foreign corporation, partnership, or association, not engaged in business in the United States, be exempt both as to principal and interest from any and all taxation now or hereafter imposed by the United States, any State, or any of the possessions of the United States, or by any local taxing authority.

SEC. 4. That any incorporated bank or trust company designated as a depositary by the Secretary of the Treasury under the authority conferred by section 8 of the second liberty bond act, as amended by the third liberty bond act, which gives security for such deposits as, and to amounts, by him prescribed, may, upon and subject to such terms and conditions as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe, act as a fiscal agent of the United States in connection with the operations of selling and delivering any bonds, certificates of indebtedness, or war savings certificates of the United States.

SEC. 5. That the short title of this act shall be "fourth liberty bond act."

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I do not consider it necessary to make any extended statement with reference to this bill. If the bill shall be passed, it will make the fourth of such bills that we have passed. The bill has been read from the Secretary's desk and is easily understood.

I wish simply to say that my information is that the bill was reported to the other House by a unanimous vote of the Ways and Means Committee, and that it passed the House without a dissenting vote. It was referred to the Finance Committee of the Senate, and comes back with a unanimous report from that committee. We have not recommended any amendment to the bill as it passed the House.

The provisions of the bill are very simple. It merely increases the amount of liberty bonds heretofore authorized from $12,000,000,000 to $20,000,000,000. It also provides that such bonds, when purchased by a nonresident alien individual or by foreign corporations, associations, or copartnerships not doing business in the United States, shall be exempt from taxation either by the Federal Government or by any State or municipal division of any State.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS. I desire to ask the Senator from North Carolina what the provision of the law is with reference to the taxation of bonds which are held by foreign nonresidents?

Mr. SIMMONS. The present law imposes the same tax upon bonds owned by nonresident aliens that it does upon bonds owned by citizens of this country.

Mr. THOMAS. I was unable to attend the meetings of the Finance Committee having consideration of this bill, and I therefore would like to be informed why the change is now proposed whereby this exemption is to take effect?

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator from Colorado will recall that in the last liberty-bond bill we inserted a provision authorizing the issuance of a certain number of those bonds payable in foreign money or moneys. That was done for the purpose of stabilizing exchange and for the additional purpose of furnishing an inducement or incentive to foreign investors to buy those bonds. The testimony before the Ways and Means Committee showed that it was impracticable to induce foreigners to invest in these bonds if they were subject to Federal and State taxation, and if we were to secure such purchasers for these bonds from abroad it would be necessary to relieve them from taxation.

Mr. THOMAS. May I ask whether any of the former issues were purchased with foreign money or by foreign investors?

Mr. SIMMONS. I think not; but I understand none were so sold.

Mr. THOMAS. In other words, the purpose of section 3 is to place all bonds upon an equality with regard to the exemption feature?

Mr. SIMMONS. All bonds sold to nonresident aliens, so long as the oeneficial interest in the bond is owned by them—so it is a corporation.

Mr. THOMAS. As well as those which are to be authorized by this bill?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes. The bonds that are authorized by this bill to be paid for in foreign money and sold to foreigners, to nonresident aliens, would not be subject to taxation at all, while the bonds sold in our own markets are subject to the surtax and the inheritance tax.

Mr. THOMAS. Then, if I understand the Senator, this is a retroactive provision?

Mr. SIMMONS. It applies also to those bonds which have been issued or authorized. There are about $4,000,000,000 of those bonds which have heretofore been authorized, but have not up to this time been sold, and this applies to those $4,000,000,000 of bonds as well as to the additional $8,000,000,000 of bonds authorized by this bill.

Mr. SMOOT. It would also apply to any bonds that have already been issued, where they have been sold to alien nonresidents. It is retroactive so far as they are concerned.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; it applies to all bonds heretofore sold or authorized; but, as I have stated, none of these bonds have been sold to nonresident aliens.

Mr. President, there is just one other provision in the bill to which I desire to refer, and that is an authorization to the Secretary of the Treasury to designate any duly authorized depository bank as a fiscal agent of the Government in connection with the sale of these bonds.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield.

Mr. McCUMBER. Before the Senator takes his seat I think he should make some explanation as to the reason for authorizing only $8,000,000,000 of bonds at this time. This authorization is based upon an estimate that we shall expend during this fiscal year about $24,000,000,000, $4,000,000,000 of which——

Mr. SIMMONS. I will make the statement, if the Senator desires.

Mr. McCUMBER. I merely wish to finish this statement—$4,000,000,000 of which are taken care of in the last liberty loan act, leaving $20,000,000,000 to be provided for, of which it is proposed to raise $8,000,000,000 by taxes. That would leave $12,000,000,000 more to be raised by bonds, while this bill provides only for the raising of $8,000,000,000. Some of us did not agree with the Secretary of the Treasury that we should not proceed immediately to raise the full $12,000,000,000, because we felt that before the ink was fairly dry on this bill we should be called upon for another $4,000,000,000 loan. I thought it would be well perhaps for the Senator to explain that to the Senate.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, as the Senator has said, it is estimated that we will require $24,000,000,000 to meet the expenses of the fiscal year 1919. Under the second liberty loan act and the amendments thereto $12,000,000,000 of bonds could be issued. About $4,000,000,000 of that amount have not been issued up to this time. In addition to that $12,000,000,000 the pending bill authorizes $8,000,000,000 more, which, added to the $4,000,000,000 heretofore authorized and not yet issued, would make $12,000,000,000 of bonds which the Secretary of the Treasury may hereafter sell. That, added to the $8,000,000,000 estimated from taxes already levied and expected to be levied, would amount to $20,000,000,000, or $4,000,000,000 less than we will require if our 1919 expenditures shall reach the amount estimated, namely, $24,000,000,000.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Will the Senator permit me a question, if he is through with that matter?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. SIMMONS. I will yield in a moment. Inquiry has been made why we should not now authorize the additional $4,000,000,000, instead of waiting for a later time. We have pursued the policy heretofore of authorizing a less amount of bonds than was believed to be necessary, added to the other receipts of the Government, to meet expenditures. That policy has been adopted because, in the condition in which we find ourselves, it is utterly impossible for the Treasury Department, or the heads of the different departments of the Government, safely to estimate what will be ultimately required to meet expenses, and we have left the matter open, so that in the future we may add to the additional amount necessary whatever unforeseen expenditures have to be provided for. None of us knows how much the expenditures will be during the fiscal year 1919. It now seems to the departments that $24,000,000,000 will be sufficient, but we have just entered upon this fiscal year, and before winter or before next spring it may be found necessary to issue a much larger amount of bonds to meet expenditures. That will depend upon conditions and developments. It is the same policy that we have pursued with reference to other authorizations, and the Secretary of the Treasury thought that it would be wiser to leave the matter open, so as to provide later whatever amount the future might disclose to be necessary. I think that answers the suggestion of the Senator from North Dakota.

I now yield to the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. On entering the Chamber I heard a colloquy as to the exemption from taxation of bonds bought with foreign money.

Mr. SIMMONS. Bonds payable in foreign money.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I understand that bonds payable in foreign money are exempt from taxation?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; bonds payable in foreign money and purchased either by nonresident alien individuals or by nonresident alien corporations not doing business in this country.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Does that exemption—and this is the point I wish particularly to have settled in my own mind—apply to the bonds already sold?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; it is retroactive.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Is there any estimate as to the amount of bonds that we are thus relieving from taxation?

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not think any of these bonds have been sold to nonresident alien individuals and corporations.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Then, so far as the bonds already sold are concerned, this provision would be practically negligible in its effect upon the collection of revenue?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes. We have not been able to sell them abroad, because the foreigner will not buy our bonds if he understands that they are liable not only to pay a fixed tax to the Government, but liable to be taxed by the States an indefinite and unascertained amount.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield to the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I wish to ask, Is there any provision in this bill that prevents the transfer of these bonds to an American citizen after they have been bought by foreigners?

Mr. SIMMONS. No; there is no specific provision to that effect.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Then I wish to ask the Senator if it is not quite likely that Americans who desire to buy bonds in large amounts will execute their purchases through a foreign corporation or a foreign citizen and thus avoid the tax?

Mr. SIMMONS. There might be a possibility of that.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Is it not highly probable that such will be the case?

Mr. SIMMONS. No; because the act provides against that.

Mr. BANKHEAD. How does the act provide for it, I will ask the Senator?

Mr. SIMMONS. In this way—I will read the provision:

SEC. 3. That notwithstanding the provisions of the second liberty bond act, as amended by the third liberty bond act, or of the war-finance corporation act, bonds and certificates of indebtedness of the United States payable in any foreign money or foreign moneys, and bonds of the War Finance Corporation payable in any foreign money or foreign moneys exclusively or in the alternative, shall, if and to the extent expressed in such bonds at the time of their issue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, while beneficially owned by a nonresident alien individual, or by a foreign corporation, partnership, or association, not engaged in business in the United States.

So the bonds are exempt from taxation only so long as they are beneficially owned by a nonresident alien individual or by a foreign corporation.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Then, Mr. President, the Senator from North Carolina construes that language to mean that bonds purchased by a foreign corporation or an alien nonresident could not be transferred to an American citizen and thereby enable that citizen to benefit from the tax-exemption feature? Is that the Senator's construction?

Mr. SIMMONS. That is my construction of it. The bond must be beneficially owned by the nonresident in order to escape the tax. The moment the bond ceases to be beneficially owned by the foreign resident it will become liable to the tax; that is my construction of it.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to say to the Senator from Alabama that the reason why the residents of the United States would not purchase these bonds through a corporation or a partnership or an association or an alien individual of a foreign country is that it is true that the tax, as far as the Government of the United States is concerned, could be avoided in that way; but the individual who would do that, if he were a citizen of the United States, would be taxed according to the tax laws of the country in which those bonds were sold; or if it were a corporation, it would have to pay the excess-profits tax. No corporation is going to hold those bonds for an individual in the United States and pay the tax unless the individual in the United States is charged up with it, and ordinarily the tax there is about as great as it is in the United States, so he would not undertake that kind of business.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I doubt it very much.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield.

Mr. KELLOGG. The explanation made by the Senator from Utah would be true, undoubtedly, so far as England, France, Italy, or the other belligerent countries are concerned.

Mr. SMOOT. They are the only ones that are affected.

Mr. KELLOGG. And I think there is no question that it is only while the bonds are so owned in foreign countries that they are exempt from taxation; but there is one other question, and that is this: Is there anything in this bill to prevent an American citizen from organizing a corporation in any South American country or any nonbelligerent country where the taxation is not high, where it is less than it is in this country, or in a belligerent country, and the stock being held by American citizens? Those bonds, while held in such foreign countries by this foreign corporation with American stockholders, I am inclined to think, would be exempt. I should like to ask the Senator from North Carolina if that can be protected by the Treasury Department by a provision in the bond itself?

Mr. SIMMONS. I have no doubt that it can be. I think the intent and purpose of the exemption is very, very clear, and I think the Treasury Department would have ample authority so to draft the bond as to carry out that intent and afford protection against such an evasion as that referred to by the Senator.

Mr. KELLOGG. The bill provides that these bonds payable in foreign money—

Shall, if and to the extent expressed in such bonds at the time of their issue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, while beneficially owned by a nonresident alien individual, or by a foreign corporation, partnership, or association, not engaged in business in the United States, be exempt both as to principal and interest from any and all taxation now or hereafter imposed by the United States, any State, or any of the possessions of the United States, or by any local taxing authority.

I have not examined this, but it would seem as though American citizens, if they were so disposed, might organize a corporation in foreign countries where the rate of taxation was less than it is in this country, and that such a corporation could hold Government bonds exempt from our taxation. I simply suggest that with a view of avoiding any such frauds if it opens the door for them.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not know, of course, what may be the provisions of the laws of different foreign countries in reference to the organization of corporations by nonresidents. I assume that while a nonresident might in most countries be a stockholder in a domestic corporation at least a majority of the stock in such corporation would have to be owned by citizens of the country of incorporation. I do not suppose it is the purpose and intent to deny this exemption to a foreign corporation because a fraction of its stock might be held by citizens of this country, but if the case presented by the Senator developed, if it should be made to appear to the Secretary of the Treasury that the law was being evaded by taking advantage of the liberal incorporation laws of some particular country, the Secretary could, I think, protect the Government by declaring the right of exemption forfeited because of a failure of beneficial interest on the part of the holder. Not only that, but the bond could be so drawn as to provide against the exemption in such a case as that stated by the Senator from Minnesota.

The original liberty-bond act, of which this is an amendment, gives the Secretary of the Treasury the amplest and the broadest authority with reference to the terms and conditions of the bonds that may be issued, practically the only thing fixed beyond his discretion being the rate of interest and the taxation imposed. The other stipulations are left to the judgment and discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator will pardon me, here is the broad declaration in this bill that the nonresident alien individual or the foreign corporation not doing business in this country shall not enjoy this exemption unless and only so long as he or it remains beneficially the owner of the bonds. In the light of that declaration of purpose on the part of Congress, I think the Secretary of the Treasury would have ample authority, and I might say unlimited authority, in drafting the bonds to provide against any evasion of the purpose of Congress such as is apprehended by the Senator.

Mr. KELLOGG. The point I wished to guard against was, as I stated, so that American citizens could not organize corporations in these foreign countries to buy these bonds. Of course, I do not expect that it would be done to any great extent. I doubt if these bonds will be purchased to a very large extent in foreign countries; certainly not in the belligerent countries. They might be in some others.

Mr. SIMMONS. Does the Senator think that the Secretary of the Treasury would sell these bonds to a corporation of the character he indicates, although it might be nominally a foreign corporation?

Mr. KELLOGG. He certainly would not if he knew it, of course.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I had hoped that this bill would go over until to-morrow morning, but I shall not ask it. I had a good deal that I expected to say upon this bill and other subjects kindred to it. It is so late in the day, however, that it would be unwise for me to proceed to say now what I had intended to say upon this subject. I shall occupy but a little of the time of the Senate, and then I shall be content to vote upon the bill. I might as well say out of order what I had intended to say upon section 3, since it has already been discussed by the chairman of the committee and the few other Senators who are present and interested in it.

Section 3 in ordinary times would simply mean that a foreigner purchasing United States Government bonds purchases them upon a better basis than a citizen of the United States can purchase them. I will admit that that has been done by foreign countries in order that foreign money may be brought to the country issuing the bonds, but I am frank to say that I have never approved of such a policy, and certainly I could not approve of it so far as the United States is concerned, because her obligations are the best of those of any country in all the world. We do not have to go to foreign countries to seek money in order to dispose of United States bonds. During the war I do not think there will be such advantage as complained of to citizens of the United States through buying United States bonds designated in foreign money and drawing an interest rate similar to that provided by the bonds in the United States, for the reason that nearly every country where such bonds would be purchased imposes taxes to-day approximating the taxes imposed upon the individual in this country who would purchase bonds through foreign sources.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. POMERENE. Is the Senator able to state how many of these bonds or certificates of indebtedness of the United States have been sold which are payable in foreign money or foreign moneys?

Mr. SMOOT. Not a dollar.

Mr. POMERENE. Is the Senator able to state to what extent it is believed that it would encourage foreign investors?

Mr. SMOOT. To a very limited extent.

Mr. POMERENE. Is the Senator able to state to what extent it might interfere with investment in these bonds by domestic purchasers if those provisions were in the bill?

Mr. SMOOT. It will not interfere in any way unless the citizen of the United States can receive some advantage by reason of the purchase.

Mr. POMERENE. This bill has just been called to my attention and I am asking for information——

Mr. SMOOT. I understood that, Mr. President.

Mr. POMERENE. Not as indicating what views I may have, because my views on the subject are not matured; but is it likely that if these bonds, which are payable in foreign funds, were sold to foreign investors they might, after having been sold in that way free of this tax provision, be repurchased by domestic investors?

Mr. SMOOT. If they were repurchased by a domestic corporation or partnership or citizen of the United States, the interest on the bond would immediately become taxable, because section 3 provides that to be nontaxable the bond must be beneficially owned by an alien individual or by a foreign corporation or a foreign partnership.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, there is no question that that provision would give the foreigner an advantage over the American purchaser; but the slight advantage that would inure to the foreigner would be far more than overcome by the fact that the foreigner would be subject to taxes upon that income in his own country.

Mr. SMOOT. That I called attention to before, and I think we can rely upon that to be a fact at least as long as the war lasts; and the result will be that there will be no citizens of the United States investing in these bonds through corporations of a foreign country.

Mr. President, I did not offer any amendment to this bill——

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, let me answer the Senator by calling attention to the fact that in foreign countries these bonds will not be sold by advertisement, as they are in this country. They will be sold as the result of private arrangement between the Secretary and the purchasers, and in that transaction the Secretary can advise himself as to the bona fides of the purchase.

Mr. SMOOT. Of course, if a foreign corporation or an alien individual or association make application for the purchase of bonds as provided for in section 3 of this bill, they are going to get the bonds if they conform to the provisions of section 3, no matter whether we advertise or do not advertise the sale of them.

Mr. President, I stated that I offered no amendment to this bill when it was before the committee, and I am not going to offer any amendment to the bill while it is under consideration by the Senate. If I had had my way I would have had the amounts named in this bill conform to the obligations that we really know we have got to meet for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919.

Take section 2 of the bill. Section 2 provides an increase of $1,500,000,000 to purchase the obligations of foreign countries. There is none of us but knows that that amount of increase over and above the authorization to-day will not be sufficient to meet the requirements of our allies for the present fiscal year. For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, we purchased obligations of foreign Governments to the amount of $4,738,029,750.

Mr. GORE. Was that for the last fiscal year?

Mr. SMOOT. That was for the last fiscal year; or, in other words, a little less than $5,000,000,000. With this bill a law we provide, for the full fiscal year of 1919, $2,000,000,000, and we know that that is not what we must advance to our allies. So as soon as Congress meets in December, or shortly thereafter, or perhaps even before then, we shall have to pass another bill increasing the amount again at least $2,000,000,000 more. Why not do it now, and let the American people understand exactly what they have to meet and what we have to raise by taxation?

I think it is better by far to do that than pass legislation by piecemeal. You can not deceive the American people. You are not going to blind the eyes of the business men of this country until after election. They know as well as you know that this amount is not sufficient. I would have liked to see it made $2,000,000,000 more; but, as the Senator says, piecemeal legislation has been the policy in the past, and I suppose we shall have to follow it in the future.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator knows that when we passed the last bond bill, in which we undertook to provide for the Government's domestic needs only for the balance of the fiscal year 1918, we provided a billion and a half dollars to be loaned to the allies during the months of July, August, and September of the fiscal year 1919. The Senator knew then, as he knows now, that we would need for the fiscal year 1919 much more than a billion and a half dollars. He knows that we need much more than the additional billion and a half dollars; but we do not know, and the Secretary of the Treasury did not know, and it was impossible for him to know, to what extent the requirements of the allies might increase at any time, and therefore I think he thought it as wise policy not to anticipate the entire requirements of the allies any more than he anticipated the entire requirements of the Federal Government.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, if the statement made by the Senator is entirely correct—and I concede that that is the policy that has been pursued—it would make no difference to the Treasury if we had increased it $2,000,000,000; not one dollar of it would be spent in the purchase of foreign obligations unless it is absolutely necessary. The amount that we are providing for in the pending bill will only provide money for the purchase of these obligations up until about the 1st day of December.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is right; about the 1st day of December.

Mr. SMOOT. That is, if we do not purchase these obligations to any greater extent than we are doing to-day.

Mr. President, I was about to say that our direct appropriations for the fiscal year 1919 will amount in round numbers to $19,000,000,000, and in connection with the direct appropriations there are authorized appropriations for this fiscal year of $5,000,000,000 in round numbers, making the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, $24,000,000,000. That does not take into account what we may advance to our allies; and if we advance to our allies $5,000,000,000, about the same as we advanced for the fiscal year 1918, our appropriations would amount to about $29,000,000,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919.

Senators will remember that the appropriations for the fiscal year 1918 amounted to over $19,000,000,000, and the authorized appropriations to a little over $2,000,000,000. I stated to the Senate at the time the appropriations were made that it was a physical impossibility for the country to produce that amount of goods during that fiscal year; and I want to say now that it is a physical impossibility, with all the additional preparations made, to produce $24,000,000,000 worth of goods in this country during the coming fiscal year. It can not be done and provide the necessary munitions of war and the necessary orders that will have to be filled for our allies. We are not prepared to make the goods within the fiscal year.

Why, Mr. President, what were our expenses for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, notwithstanding the appropriations made? I had better name them to the Senate and the amount of each subdivision, so that they will see just what they do amount to.

Our ordinary expenses were $7,684,643,047.77.

The interest on public debt was $189,733,277.14.

We paid on account of the Panama Canal $19,268,099.30.

We purchased of obligations of foreign Governments $4,733,029,750.

We purchased of the Federal farm-loan bonds, principal $64,160,000, and accrued interest $858,296.93.

Making a total expenditure for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, of $12,696,702,471.14.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. LEWIS. Knowing how very well informed on financial matters the Senator from Utah is, I beg to ask, Am I misinformed in the assumption that we did not buy foreign securities, but that we merely exchanged the securities of America for foreign securities?

Mr. SMOOT. No, Mr. President, we purchased the obligations of foreign countries.

Mr. LEWIS. And paid for them with the money of America?

Mr. SMOOT. And paid for them by shipping those countries munitions of war and goods that were absolutely necessary, such as wheat, powder, shells, steel, automobiles, and a thousand other items.

Mr. LEWIS. May I ask the Senator, Am I wrong in the assumption that what we did was merely to make an exchange of their securities for our properties and other securities of our own? Am I wrong in that?

Mr. SMOOT. No; the Senator is right. The situation is virtually this: Whatever the balance of trade against one of our allies may be, the United States has to purchase its obligations to cover that balance. If the balance is $5,000,000,000 the coming year, the Government of the United States will purchase their obligations to the extent of $5,000,000,000. If it is $10,000,000,000, the Government of the United States will purchase ten billions of their obligations, because I want to say to the Senator now that our allies have not the gold to pay for their balances. It does not exist in the world, and the only way in which those balances can be adjusted is just the way we are doing.

Mr. LEWIS. I thank the Senator.

Mr. GERRY. Mr. President, how much of that amount does the Senator estimate is raised by taxation, not counting, of course, our loans to our allies?

Mr. SMOOT. I am just figuring it roughly in my head. I will say that the United States raised about 36 per cent of the ordinary expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, from taxation. A detail of those expenses I have already given to the Senate.

Mr. GERRY. Is it not a higher percentage than that?

Mr. SMOOT. No; and I will say to the Senator the total expenditures were $12,696,702,471.14; and in connection with that I now suggest what he and I both as members of the Finance Committee have stated time and time again before that committee, that the ordinary expenses of the Government for the last year would not exceed $13,000,000,000.

Mr. GERRY. If the Senator will yield further, I understand that over four and a half billion dollars of that sum was loaned to the allies, which makes about $8,000,000,000.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to say to the Senator I misunderstood his question.

Mr. GERRY. I thought the Senator misunderstood me.

Mr. SMOOT. I understood the Senator to say including that advanced to the allies.

Mr. GERRY. No; excluding it.

Mr. SMOOT. Then I would say that we raised by direct taxation over 50 per cent of the ordinary expenses for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918.

Mr. GERRY. That is my understanding of the situation.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask the Senator to excuse me. I misunderstood his first question.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator means, of course, to say that the $13,000,000,000 we expended last year includes the amount we loaned our allies.

Mr. SMOOT. It did. The $12,696,000,000 included $4,730,000,000 advanced, that is, the obligations of foreign countries that we purchased.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator understands that the $24,000,000,000 estimated includes the amount we propose to loan our allies.

Mr. SMOOT. No; the Senator is wrong there. I can tell the Senator the amount of every appropriation bill we have passed this session, and they amount to about $24,000,000,000.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator understands the estimated expenditures of appropriations and the appropriation bills are two entirely different and distinct things. The estimated expenditures never equal the amount appropriated.

Mr. SMOOT. I can not agree with the Senator there. My experience before the beginning of the present war is that the expenditures have always been more than the appropriations, because there has never been a time when we have not had to pass urgent deficiency appropriation bills. I recognize the fact that the appropriations made last year were made with a view of meeting every unseen condition that might arise, and they were made larger than it was possible for the country to absorb with goods manufactured in this country.

Mr. SIMMONS. Every estimate that has been made by the Treasury Department in the last year has been based not only upon the amount of money that would probably be spent for domestic purposes but upon the amount of money that would likely be spent in supplying the needs of our allies. I have here in my hand now the estimate of the Treasury Department made when we passed the last bond bill. That was on the 29th day of March. It was estimated then that the expenditures for the year 1917 would be $16,116,000,000, but that included a supposed expenditure upon account of our loans to our allies of $6,190,000,000. So the bill here includes not only what it is estimated we will expend during the fiscal year 1919 for domestic purposes but what we will expend for our allies. I think the Senator is entirely mistaken about that. I have not the statement; none has been furnished at this time with reference to the itemized estimate; but we have a statement of the itemized estimate in the last bond bill, and it shows the fact I am stating now, that although we appropriated $21,000,000,000 for 1919 and 1918, the expenditures were $16,000,000,000, and it was estimated in March $6,000,000,000 of that would be for our allies.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator certainly did not hear what I had to say or he would not question it. I stated exactly in effect what he has just stated, that the appropriations for last year amounted to over $19,000,000,000, with $2,000,000,000 authorizations, making $21,000,000,000, and instead of spending the $21,000,000,000 we expended only $12,696,702,000. But when the Senator says that the appropriations made this session, of $24,000,000,000, cover what we intend to advance to the allies for the present fiscal year he is mistaken.

Mr. SIMMONS. What I say is that the $24,000,000,000 estimated expenditures includes what it was estimated we would spend for our own purposes and what we will spend in advances to the allies.

Mr. SMOOT. I say now to expend it for this year is an absolute impossibility, for the simple reason that we have not the capacity of production in this country to reach it.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator will pardon me, I am not disagreeing with him about that. I think in 1918 we would have spent the full amount appropriated if we had been able to expend it.

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. SIMMONS. But there was a limitation upon the amount the Government could expend, and under that limitation they were not able to expend much more than half what was appropriated. I agree with the Senator that the probabilities are this year that those limitations will not be as great as they were last year, but they still will operate as a limitation upon the amount we can possibly expend. I doubt whether it is possible to expend the amount that is estimated.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHEPPARD in the chair). Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. POMERENE. A moment ago the Senator from Utah made a statement that the ratio between the money raised by taxation and that expended was about 50 to 50.

Mr. SMOOT. Over that, that is for the past fiscal year.

Mr. POMERENE. Do I understand the Senator correctly to mean that that was the ratio between the money actually raised by taxation and that which was actually expended and not that which was actually appropriated?

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator is right. It was the ratio between the money that was actually raised by taxation and the actual expenditures of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918.

Mr. POMERENE. There have been constant representations made here on the floor of the Senate by certain Senators to the effect that the amount of money raised was very much less than that indicated. That is what I wanted to make perfectly clear.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not think there ought to be any confusion about that. The amount we raised by taxation was about four billion dollars. It was a little over that, but in round numbers about four billion dollars. The actual expenditures were in round numbers something about thirteen billion dollars. That included, as has been stated, the amount that we advanced to our allies. The money that we advanced to our allies was money that we have raised by the sale of American bonds. If you include that money in the estimate of expenditures, then we raised by taxation only something less than 33⅓ per cent, but if you eliminate that, then we raised by taxation over 50 per cent.

Mr. POMERENE. I understand that, but it is not fair to represent to the public that a loan to the allies is an expenditure. That is a different account. We hope to get that back some day.

Mr. SIMMONS. I am inclined to agree with the Senator in reference to that, but what I say is that we should have a clear understanding as to what is included in these estimates, the relative amount raised by taxation and the relative amount raised by bonds. The relative amount raised by taxation and by bonds is a little less than 33⅓ per cent, if you include the bonds that we have sold to raise the money that we have loaned to our allies.

Mr. SMOOT. There is no need of having any misunderstanding about it.

Mr. SIMMONS. I hope not.

Mr. SMOOT. The ordinary expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1918, including that which we advanced to our allies, amounted to $12,696,702,471.14. Of that $12,696,702,471.14 we purchased of the obligations of our foreign allies $4,738,029,750. So deducting that from the total of $12,696,702,471.14 leaves $7,958,672,721.14.

So the actual expenses of the Government, not taking into consideration the amount of obligations that we purchased from foreign countries, is $7,958,672,721.14, and we collected by taxation in round numbers $4,300,000,000, or 54 per cent.

Mr. POMERENE. May I ask the Senator a question there?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. POMERENE. In response to a resolution passed by the Senate some time ago the Secretary of the Treasury made a report as to what the revenues would amount to, but he made the statement also at that time that there were a great many returns which had not yet come in. My information was at the time that the revenues would in fact amount to approximately $300,000,000 more than the estimate contained in the report by the Treasury Department. I am not giving the exact figures when I so state, but that was the substance of my information.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator is correct, and I want to say the estimate of the department is correct. Therefore, I say instead of the estimate made of $4,000,000,000 the amount will be about $4,300,000,000.

Mr. POMERENE. Is that information complete now or is it in part still estimated?

Mr. SMOOT. It is complete up to the collections that were made to June 30, 1918, but I will say to the Senator there are still collections to be made, and we can not say exactly to the dollar what the amount of taxes will be. But there is no question that they will be over $4,000,000,000.

Mr. POMERENE. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. GERRY. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. GERRY. Under those circumstances the amount raised will be over 50 per cent.

Mr. SMOOT. As I said, it will be 54 per cent.

Mr. GERRY. Twice as high as any other country in the world.

Mr. SMOOT. Twice as high as any other country in the world. Twenty-six and one-eighth per cent is the highest ever raised by any country.

Mr. THOMAS. What country is that?

Mr. SMOOT. England.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator states that we raised this sum by direct taxation. I suppose that included all we raised from all sources of taxation?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; in other words, it includes every tax imposed by the Government upon business and individuals.

Mr. McCUMBER. It includes our tariff as well.

Mr. SMOOT. Our tariff and our revenue tax and every tax imposed.

Mr. McCUMBER. I do not think the Senator meant to say it was by direct taxation, but that it included all taxation.

Mr. SMOOT. I thought I had on my desk a complete statement of the taxes that have been collected up to July 1 showing the amount collected in each collection district. I think it would be very interesting to the Senators who are interested in the subject to get a copy of that statement from the Internal-Revenue Bureau and study it carefully and see where the taxes are collected and see from what source.

In this connection, Mr. President, I want to say that the business interests of the country do not object to necessary taxation. They are perfectly willing to pay high rates of taxation during this war. What they object to is a law that is discriminatory and which imposes taxes unjustly upon one concern and another one escape just taxation.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I indorse what the Senator says with respect to the willingness of the business public to pay these taxes. I hope the Finance Committee will bear that fact in mind and make these taxes hereafter payable in installments and not take all of this money from the taxpayers at one time.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator is correct in his position. Taxes ought to be paid in installments. I think that will be provided for. The Senator will remember that I offered an amendment to the bill when it was being considered in the Senate making those payments at three or four different periods, but in conference it was changed.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator will pardon me, I wish to state to him that I have in my possession a communication from the Commissioner of Internal Revenue in which a recommendation is made that the taxes in the next bill be made payable in six equal installments.

Mr. SMOOT. I think the recommendation is a wise one, and I have no doubt, I will say to the Senator from Ohio, it will be agreed upon.

Mr. POMERENE. There was a light that they saw on the way from Damascus.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator from Ohio that I have no doubt when the bill is reported there will be a provision to that effect in the next revenue law.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, the Senator just expressed a hope that Senators would secure the official information regarding the distribution of taxes over the United States as shown by the reports and collections in the Treasury Department and acquaint themselves with the facts that those reports disclose. I ask the Senator to look around the Chamber and note that while we are considering a bill which will, when passed, increase the potential indebtedness of the people of the United States by eight or nine billion dollars it seems to be a subject of comparative indifference, if we may judge from the lack of attendance, and I ask him whether he thinks Senators care sufficiently about the subject to acquaint themselves with the information to which he refers? My experience is that when we are voting for revenues our attendance is comparatively small, but when we are voting for appropriations many of us are interested in those appropriations and are always on hand.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If the Senator will allow me, I wish to say that I find in that an expression of confidence in the Finance Committee of the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. What I wanted to say is this, that I do not believe Senators expected this bill to be brought up for consideration at this late hour in the day, and I see I have been on the floor for an hour, when I did not expect to occupy the floor for more than 15 minutes. But the subject is a broad one, and when you start out on one line you hardly know just where you can stop. I think the best thing for me to do is to stop right now, and let us vote upon the bill.

Mr. THOMAS. I am afraid that if the Senator should attempt to comment upon the present revenue law his language might not be parliamentary.

Mr. SMOOT. I will admit, Mr. President, that I have written letters about the law that I should dislike to have published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I anticipated that the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] was about to yield the floor, and I wish to make an inquiry and also a statement before he concludes.

This bill was reported to the Senate from the Committee on Finance on the 29th day of June. That was last Saturday—not in time, of course, for action on that day. The following Monday was July 1. We had July 1 and July 2 and July 3. The death of the late lamented Senator Tillman was not a day for legislation. July 4 was yesterday, and this practically has been the first day on which this bill could be called up for any parliamentary procedure. While the appropriation bills and bills of this character are always in order, and every Member of this body must take parliamentary notice and be in his seat, yet I wish to state not only these preliminary facts, but the further fact that this afternoon, in this short time, it provides for the creation of an immense public debt.

Now, I want to inquire of the Senator from Utah, keeping in mind that our maximum amount of money available for all purposes, public and private, in this country does not exceed $6,000,000,000, as a liberal estimate, and $6,000,000,000 must be so utilized as to provide for all this immense expansion of credit, for a probable collection, before the next fiscal year ends, of not $4,000,000,000 but of $8,000,000,000.

This expansion of credit and the great increase in taxation will require a dollar of United States money to move with greater nimbleness than was ever known in the history of any country in its financial transactions. I desire to ask if all this is not something that should cause us to reflect very soberly upon such legislation?

Then, I wish to inquire further of the Senator, especially in view of a very potential fact that he has mentioned here—that our manufacturing ability will not suffice to absorb this immense proportion of credit that we are providing here—whether there is any reason for this great expansion of credit at this time; whether there is any reason for the expansion provided in this bill, in view of our potential manufacturing ability; whether, in other words, we could not take some experience to heart from the expenditures of the last fiscal year and provide for some more prudent husbanding of our resources?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, in answer to the Senator from Illinois, I will say that if we covered all of the estimates of the departments, or even if we covered the appropriations that have been made at this session, instead of being $8,000,000,000 increase it would be $12,000,000,000 increase, and instead of being $20,000,000,000 authorization it would be $24,000,000,000.

I am not one who shies whenever the word "inflation" is uttered. I know that there is going to be inflation of the currency of the United States.

Mr. THOMAS. There is inflation.

Mr. SMOOT. I know that there is inflation, and I know that there will be greater inflation before the war is over. I know our currency or Federal bank notes will not have a gold reserve such as we have always insisted upon in the past. Our paper dollars will be secured with all the gold that we now hold, which is only about $3,000,000,000—one-quarter of all the gold in the world—but back of them are the immense resources and credit of the greatest Government on earth, and the latter is what is going to keep our paper money at par.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I desire to inquire of the Senator, again with the Senator's permission, whether to-day we ought not, in the Senate Chamber, to consider that we are no longer on a gold-paying basis, but are to-day traveling on a credit basis?

Mr. SMOOT. There is no question about it, Mr. President. I do not hesitate in saying it—all the people of the world know it. If they do not know it, it is because the knowledge would have no significance to them. However, you can not fool the business men of this country or of the world. They know how much gold we have; they know what our circulation is; they also know what our obligations are. The business men of foreign countries follow the changes in our financial conditions just as closely as we follow them.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. THOMAS. Does not the Senator also know that we have been upon a credit basis practically ever since our declaration of war?

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Colorado is virtually correct, although I should say that for the first six months of the war, with the immense gold reserve which we had, and the further fact that the war for the three years preceding had brought an additional billion dollars of gold to our country, and with that extra billion of dollars and the paying of our foreign obligations by the shipment of goods and the purchase of American bonds held in foreign countries placed us upon a wonderful financial basis; but our present currency, if issued in ordinary times, would be considered bordering upon inflation. When I say that I do not mean to say that it even approaches that of Germany, or of England, or of France; but I call the attention of the Senate to the fact that as the war proceeds the difference will grow less, for we know that every soldier we put into the field costs the Government of the United States eight times as much as a soldier costs the French Government and ten times as much as every soldier which Germany has fighting for her.

Mr. THOMAS. It costs fourteen times as much.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Colorado says it costs fourteen times as much. I have seen that statement made time and again, and have tried to figure it out from the number of men that Germany has in the field on the best reports that I could get, together with the obligations that the German Government is reported to have issued, and I can only make it about ten times the amount we pay for each soldier we put in the field. However, I am sure that I am within reason when I say the cost is ten times as much. So, if this war continues another year or two years more, I want to say to Senators that we need not worry about currency inflation, for it will be with us in full bloom. We are going to keep every dollar of gold we have; there is no doubt about that; and I should have liked, if it had been possible for us to do so, to have kept every ounce of silver we possessed at the beginning of the war in this country.

When the war is over the time will come when we shall have to protect our paper money. We shall have to meet the competition of the world; then we shall have to have a credit, not based upon paper alone, but upon something back of it that the world will accept. Every unnecessary expenditure ought to be avoided. We ought to scrutinize our appropriations most carefully.

I will admit, Mr. President, that for the first year of the war I paid little attention to appropriations asked for. I did not care what the departments requested by way of appropriations. I felt that it was to be given to them. I felt that way this year also, and I desire now to state that so far as I am concerned, if it becomes necessary for the Government to take every cent that I own on earth to win this war, most cheerfully will I give it. What good would money be to me if the war is won by Germany?

I would rather die, and I was going to say I would rather see every child of mine in the grave, than to see Germany dominate this world; and if she wins this war, that is what she will do. So whatever is required to bring success to our cause must be furnished, and whatever demand is made upon the people by way of the payment of taxes or the purchase of bonds is going to be met.

Mr. President, so far as I am concerned I would rather have seen this bill provide for what we know we are going to need, for it would not make one cent of difference to the Treasury of the United States to have done so. We do not incur an obligation until the bonds of the Government are issued; we do not have to raise the money for the purchase of obligations of foreign countries until the necessity arises; and if the war should cease in three months, it would make no difference whether this bill authorized $1,500,000,000 more or $5,000,000,000 more; it would not be used if not required. So I think the best way to deal with the American people and with American business men is to tell them plainly what we are going to do, and let them prepare for it.

I promise you to-day there is not a business man in the United States who will object to taxation or to any demand made by our Government, provided he knows that when he is taxed his competitors shall be taxed in the same way and on the same basis. I indulge the hope, Mr. President, that when the next revenue bill comes to the Senate it will be based upon that principle, carried out irrespective of what section of the country or whom it may hit; that the burdens will fall evenly upon all based upon actual profits made.

It is late and I must close.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I shall not detain the Senate to discuss this bill at any length, but I should like to call the attention of the Senate to section 3, which provides an exemption of these bonds from taxation in the hands of nonresident alien individuals, foreign corporations, partnerships, or associations not engaged in business in the United States.

I presume it is true that England, France, Italy, and Russia also, I imagine, have been selling their bonds in this country under provisions exempting them from taxation under those Governments, and, of course, it would seem on its face to be fair that we should do the same as to our bonds. I am not familiar with their laws providing for such exemption, but our positions are different. There is not any possibility of selling our bonds to the belligerent countries for they are straining their financial resources to the limit to take their own bonds and provide for their own expenses. One of the weaknesses of Great Britain and of France is that they have been compelled to go to foreign countries to borrow money to secure provisions and supplies. The strongest position we can be in in this war is to finance the war ourselves by our own bonds, sold to our own people, and by taxation. Then when the war closes we will have no foreign accounts to settle.

I do not believe that any considerable number of the bonds proposed to be issued could be placed in neutral countries. It is possible that that might be done, but I do not believe it can be done. I am not advised, as the Finance Committee undoubtedly are, as to the reasons for placing this clause in the bond bill to stabilize foreign exchange. If the Finance Committee has valid reasons given by the Treasury Department why we should have this clause in the bill in order to sell bonds in foreign countries so as to stabilize exchange, I should like to hear them, and should undoubtedly give great weight to their opinion; but I am afraid that some of the provisions of this clause may be used for escaping just taxation.

It is perfectly true that it would be impossible for us to sell those bonds to Great Britain or France if they were subject to taxation here and also subject to taxation there; but under this provision a foreign corporation may purchase these bonds and they may be exempt not only now but after the war closes, although their stockholders may be American citizens and American corporations. I presume a proper construction of this provision would permit the Secretary of the Treasury, if it is called to his attention, to place some clause in the bond which would prohibit that; but it is a question whether it is wise for us to permit foreign corporations, without any regulation as to whom their stockholders shall be, to buy these bonds and hold them exempt from any taxation. I am aware of the fact, of course, that if we were compelled to go to foreign countries to borrow money, or if there were any great reason why we should do so, we would have to make the bonds exempt.

I do not wish to move an amendment which the Finance Committee does not approve, but I do desire to call to the attention of the Finance Committee the danger of this provision.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, before the Senator concludes, will he permit me to inquire if some gentleman from Illinois or Minnesota might not go to Honduras or any other Central American republic and organize a corporation for any particular purpose, for shipping tropical fruits or for agriculture, and buy those bonds and have them remain in the hands of a foreign corporation, people living in Bogota or Sao Paulo, and escape taxation entirely?

Mr. KELLOGG. I should say that could be done, provided the laws of Honduras permitted corporations to be organized there with foreign stockholders. I have every reason to believe that most foreign countries permit such organizations. We do in almost all of the States. We may organize corporations in most of the States of the Union where all of the stockholders are foreign stockholders, except enough stock to qualify certain local directors. There are varying provisions or regulations covering this subject; but, generally speaking, corporations may be organized here with foreign stockholders; and although I have not looked up the provisions of the particular countries, I have no doubt that such is the case in most, if not all, foreign countries.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will say to the Senator that citizens of my State are engaged in business all over Central America. I do not know of a country there that does not have some of my constituents doing business in it—generally incorporated, too—and it is by the consent of the laws of those countries. It is the easiest thing in the world, because their charters are not so specific as ours. You can get a charter from a Central American republic that will allow you to engage in the banking and insurance business and run a sawmill at the same time, if you want to, or anything else that you can think of, or buy bonds and go into the bond-brokerage business.

Mr. KELLOGG. I am not desirous of preventing the Treasury Department from selling these bonds to foreign citizens or corporations of foreign countries. If it is deemed advisable to do so and they have sufficient reasons for making such sales, I do not wish to prevent them; but I do wish to call attention to the danger that there is in this clause of the bill.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, the provision with reference to the sale of bonds to citizens of foreign countries payable in foreign money was put in the third liberty-bond act, as I recall, upon the floor of the Senate, and was subsequently approved by the Secretary of the Treasury. No amount of bonds for this purpose is authorized. The purpose, as stated in the debate at the time the Senate adopted this provision with reference to bonds payable in foreign money, was solely to stabilize the rate of exchange between the country in which they are sold and this country, that condition having been very greatly disrupted by the war.

I wish to read to the Senator the provision of that act. It is not brought forward in this bill because this bill is but an amendment to the second liberty-bond act and the amendments thereto. Here is the provision:

> That any of the bonds or certificates of indebtedness authorized by this act may be issued by the Secretary of the Treasury payable, principal and interest, in any foreign money or foreign moneys, as expressed in such bonds or certificates, but not also in United States gold coin, and he may dispose of such bonds or certificates in such manner and at such prices, not less than par, as he may determine, without compliance with the provisions of the third paragraph of section 1. In determining the amount of bonds and certificates issuable under this act the dollar equivalent of the amount of any bonds or certificates payable in foreign money or foreign moneys shall be determined by the par of exchange at the date of issue thereof, as estimated by the Director of the Mint, and proclaimed by the Secretary of the Treasury, in pursuance of the provisions of section 25 of the act approved August 27, 1894, entitled "An act to reduce taxation, to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes." The Secretary of the Treasury may designate depositaries in foreign countries, with which may be deposited as he may determine all or any part of the proceeds of any bonds or certificates authorized by this act, payable in foreign money or foreign moneys.

So stabilization of exchange was the one object and purpose sought to be accomplished. The amount of bonds that the Secretary should issue for this purpose was not fixed, but he was authorized, as I understand—and I think that is the proper interpretation of it—only to issue such amount of these bonds as might be necessary for the accomplishment of that specific purpose.

Mr. KELLOGG. Did the former bond bill contain the exemption clause, the same as this?

Mr. SIMMONS. No; it did not.

Mr. KELLOGG. Does the Secretary think it is necessary that it should be placed in this bill?

Mr. SIMMONS. The Secretary thinks it is absolutely necessary if he is to sell any of these bonds at all in this way, because he has not been able to sell any of the bonds authorized under the former act, and is not able to sell them, because they are subject to both National and State taxation.

Mr. KELLOGG. And he thinks it is necessary to sell some in order to stabilize exchange?

Mr. SIMMONS. To stabilize exchange; the facts being that in many of the South American countries, in Spain, and other countries, the American dollar is now below par, and as a result our merchants and traders are losing large sums of money, and they will continue to lose money, because of this disparity. This is the only means of stabilization that has been suggested up to this time. Of course, we could accomplish this result by shipping our gold, but we are not under present conditions going to do that. We might control our purchases and remedy it in that way; but that would involve a curtailment of our sales.

Mr. KELLOGG. There is no question that the American dollar is at a discount in many countries, and that it is costing the people of this country millions and millions of dollars. I have no doubt of that, and I have no doubt that everything possible should be done to stabilize the exchange. If this will do it, I do not wish to object to it.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator will pardon me, I was going to say I assume that the Secretary will not issue and sell any greater amount of these bonds than he thinks is necessary for this purpose; and as his power with reference to the matter is plenary—that is, whether he sells or does not sell, the conditions upon which he sells, and to whom he shall sell—unless he is satisfied that the purchase is a bona fide purchase and is not made for the mere colorable purpose of evading taxation, I assume he will not dispose of them. If any of these bonds are purchased for that purpose and that situation is disclosed, the bonds will become subject to the same conditions with reference to taxation as any other bonds issued under this act.

Mr. KELLOGG. Of course it goes without saying that we can not sell these bonds if they are subject to local taxation or any taxation we may hereafter place upon them. That goes without saying; and if it is necessary or advisable to sell them in order to stabilize exchange or to get money, we must put in a clause of this kind. I do not know, of course, how important it is to have the privilege of selling those bonds to foreign countries.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think, if the Senator will pardon me, that the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN], who very strenuously advocated this provision as chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency, brought the situation to the attention of the Senate and very strongly urged this as a way and perhaps the most feasible to accomplish this very desirable purpose.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I simply want to say that the laws of exchange are just as binding upon the business of the world as the laws of health are binding upon the individual living in the world. We can pass all the laws we want to, and by so doing we will never stabilize foreign exchange unless the condition of the world's trade is such that transfers of credits can be made to settle trade balances. The Senator from Oklahoma can talk himself black in the face, and he can suggest all sorts of panaceas, but I want to say that whenever the trade of the world is in the condition that it is to-day, where every country in the world says that what gold it holds shall continue to be held, there is no law that we can pass that is ever going to stabilize foreign exchange.

If I had the time, I would go into the question and tell the Senator from Minnesota why the American dollar to-day is at a discount. I can take the balance of trade against us of every country, and as that balance of trade increases in millions, so the price of the American dollar decreases, unless transfers of credits can be arranged and we refuse to allow gold to go to the creditor country to pay the balance. We might just as well understand the situation as it is, and not try to do something that can not be done.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I do not know whether the Senator is antagonizing the provisions or whether he is merely expressing a doubt as to whether it will accomplish the purpose in view.

Mr. SMOOT. I have not made a motion that the section be eliminated. I am simply saying, however, that if either the Treasury Department or the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] expects that section 3 of this bill is going to stabilize the American dollar he is going to wake up in the near future and be greatly disappointed. All that it could possibly do would be this: If the balance of trade was against us and in favor of Spain, we will say, or any other country—I do not care what country it is—and that country should purchase bonds to the extent of the balance, then, of course, our American dollar would be higher than if the purchase had not been made.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, if I understand the views of the Senator from Utah, who has expressed himself with his usual emphasis and confidence, he thinks it is impossible except by the use of gold to stabilize the exchange markets of the world.

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, no; the Senator is mistaken when he says that.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is what I understand the Senator to mean.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator is mistaken there. There is another way, and that is the way that is always resorted to by every country in the world; namely, they must either furnish the gold or they must stop the balance of trade between the two countries by purchasing less from one or the other, as the case may be.

Mr. SIMMONS. They can only stabilize it, according to the view of the Senator from Utah, by stopping trade or by the use of gold; one of the two?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I do not know, and I do not suppose anybody knows definitely, whether we can stabilize exchange by the method proposed in this bill or any other method except the method mentioned by the Senator of stopping trading with the balance of the world. Certainly we are not going to stop trading with the balance of the world, so that sovereign remedy is denied us.

Now, I do not understand that the original author of the scheme embraced in the bill, the chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee of this body, was absolutely certain that this scheme would stabilize exchange. I do not understand that the Treasury Department, which heartily indorsed this scheme for the achievement of this purpose, felt absolutely sure that it would stabilize exchange; but the Senator from Oklahoma and the Secretary of the Treasury and the able Assistant Secretaries of the Treasury who cooperated with the committees of the House and of the Senate in this matter believed it a promising means of accomplishing that purpose. They had enough confidence in it to come to Congress and ask authority that they may try it out, and we had enough confidence in it to give the authority. It is now proposed to so amend the original grant of authority as to make the scheme workable.

We have not said to the Secretary of the Treasury, "You shall issue so many bonds of this character," but we have said, "Issue as many as in your judgment may contribute to the accomplishment of this purpose. Try it. If after you have tried it it does not accomplish the purpose, then stop it."

There is nothing mandatory about the provision. It merely gives the Secretary of the Treasury discretion and authority to try what some people—although the Senator from Utah does not agree with them—of considerable vision and financial experience and ability think may contribute to this end.

So far as any injury resulting to the country as a result of this action is concerned, I believe that the authority of the Secretary of the Treasury over this matter is sufficient to protect and safeguard the interests of the Government.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no amendment to be proposed, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by G. F. Turner, one of its clerks, announced that the House agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10069) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the House recedes from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1 and 2 to the bill (H. R. 10069) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, and agrees to the same.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATIONS—CONFERENCE REPORT.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives agreeing to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10069) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, and receding from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1 and 2 to the bill, and agreeing to the same.

Mr. FLETCHER. The House having agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the river and harbor appropriation bill, and having receded from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1 and 2 to the bill, I ask that the conference report submitted by me a few days ago be taken up for consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The report was agreed to.

NORTH ATLANTIC COAST CANALS.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I desire to offer a very short resolution, simply asking for information from the Secretary of Commerce regarding some important matters, and I ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the resolution will be read to the Senate.

Mr. FLETCHER. With the understanding that it does not displace the unfinished business.

The resolution (S. Res. 277) was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of Commerce is hereby directed to furnish for the use of the Senate such information as is available concerning the advantage and value to the commerce of the country of the acquisition, construction, and maintenance of the canals connecting Chesapeake Bay with the Delaware River, that river by a canal across the State of New Jersey with New York Harbor, and the canal connecting Massachusetts Bay with Buzzards Bay, such report to include, so far as available, estimated costs of purchase and development of same, respectively, as deep sea-level canals, what relief will be thereby afforded to lines of existing rail transportation, and the extent to which such canals would probably be utilized by the commerce of the country, and the incidental value thereof as assisting the national defense.

ARMY APPROPRIATIONS—CONFERENCE REPORT (S. DOC. NO. 260).

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, as the chairman of the Military Affairs Committee of the Senate I desire to state that the conferees of the House and Senate have agreed upon a report, and, while the House has the papers, and therefore will have to act on the report first, in order that the Senate may be advised about it I simply present the report, not for action, but that it may be printed for the information of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, that action will be taken.

SOLDIERS' MAIL IN FRANCE.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I ask unanimous consent to offer the resolution which I send to the desk, and ask for its present consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the resolution will be read to the Senate.

The resolution (S. Res. 276) was read, as follows:

Whereas the regular dispatch and delivery, so far as it is humanly possible under present war conditions, of letter mail or other necessary mail matter to and from those who are in any capacity a part of the American Expeditionary Force on foreign soils has much to do with the morale of our troops abroad, and contributes immensely toward the peace of mind of relatives and friends in the United States; and

Whereas the complaints here and abroad are persistent that the mail deliveries, both abroad and in this country, to our soldiers there and to their friends and relatives here are wretchedly inadequate, much of the mail failing to reach its destination: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Secretary of War and the Postmaster General be, and hereby are, directed to make a report to the Senate at the earliest practicable moment, each covering the operations of his department as to the movements of the mails to and from our troops and auxiliaries abroad, and what steps are being taken to improve the service.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, what is the nature of that paper?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is a resolution, and unanimous consent is asked for its immediate consideration.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection being made, the resolution goes over for one day.

Mr. FLETCHER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, is that a Senate resolution?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A Senate resolution.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Then I object to its presentation to-day, Mr. President. Unanimous consent has not been given for its presentation to-day. We are entitled to a statement of what the matter is, and then the question should be submitted to the Senate of permitting presentation out of order. The Chair did not ask the Senate for unanimous consent. I was on my feet all the time trying to find out what it was.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I asked unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution and understood that it was given.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That question was not submitted to the Senate. I do not think unanimous consent was given to the presentation of the resolution. I was waiting to hear it submitted because I wanted to know what it was.

My objection is this: If it is presented to-day, unless we recess it is open to discussion to-morrow. I am objecting to having any part of to-morrow taken up with it when there are other measures to be considered. If the Senator will refer it to the proper committee for consideration, I have no objection; but I do object to a resolution getting before us to-morrow that we are to consume time upon and that will prevent action upon bills which have been passed by the House.

If the Senate will stay here several days longer and finish all the pressing business, I have not the slightest objection to the presentation of this resolution now, but if we are to recess to-morrow I think we ought to dispose of other measures that have been acted upon by the House, some of which are important.

While I am upon my feet, I think it is a good time for me to explain two of the bills I have in mind. One is the House bill amending the war-risk insurance legislation, especially with reference to marine insurance. It provides, first, authority for the Shipping Board where they charter neutral vessels, and to American citizens where they charter neutral vessels, to use our war-risk insurance to insure the vessels. It provides, second, authority for the Secretary of the Treasury to make settlement of claims growing out of either our marine insurance or our war-risk insurance. It provides, third, for the extension of our marine insurance until the close of the war. This measure is deemed very important by that branch of the Treasury Department which has charge of war-risk insurance.

The other measure to which I desire to direct the attention of the Senate, and while I have the floor I do so now—I may not get another good opportunity—is a House bill providing for placing machinery in certain buildings already constructed by the Government at an expense of about $200,000 in the Government penitentiary located at Atlanta. After a very thorough investigation recommendations were made that these buildings should be constructed, and they were constructed, to be used by the Government for weaving heavy duck, so much needed now by the Government in connection with war necessities.

I have a letter from the President urging the prompt passage of this House bill, which authorizes purchase of the machinery and the weaving of duck in the penitentiary at the city of Atlanta.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. May I inquire if the Senator believes that those measures may interfere with the passage of this very necessary resolution?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not know. If we recess to-morrow, I do not know what we are to do.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. If there is any possibility of that, why recess?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am opposed to a recess until necessary measures are considered.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. So am I.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. While we have any important measure before us that needs attention we should not recess.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, there is not any more important measure that can be before us than the resolution which has been introduced by the Senator from West Virginia. He seeks an inquiry into what are the most outrageous and shameful mail facilities that we now have with our boys who are in France, and he asks by the resolution, respectively, of the Secretary of War and of the Postmaster General, that they advise us why it is that the boys who are over there can not receive letters for a given month when during that month many, many letters are written to them.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I call the Senator's attention to the fact——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It was impossible for me to hear the resolution as it was read, and I really did not understand what it is. I only gathered that it was a resolution that would provoke interest and might take time.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. It is a resolution, if the Senator will pardon me, looking to better mail facilities for our boys in France.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If there is no objection to the resolution by any other Senator, I withdraw my objection and consent to its immediate consideration. Let us pass it and get it out of the way. My only object in objecting was to prevent that consumption of time which I think we ought to use before we leave on a recess to pass certain measures that I think should be disposed of, and the two I have referred to which are intrusted to my charge I am very desirous of having acted upon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. FLETCHER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. I will state further that after the executive session it is the purpose to move a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

RECESS.

Mr. MARTIN. I move that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Saturday, July 6, 1918, at 11 o'clock a. m.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O God, our heavenly Father, our hearts go out to Thee in gratitude and love for the splendid, fervent, and glorious tributes poured out for our Independence Day, not only by our own people but by the peoples associated with us in defense of that liberty handed down to us and all the world by our fathers, a splendid heritage, which all the liberty-loving people are fighting for, praying for, in this hour.

May the tributes of yesterday be an inspiration to us and our allies in the mighty struggle.

In Thee we trust that at last liberty and justice shall be established for all the world, and pæans of praise we will give to Thee in the name of the Prince of Peace and Righteousness. Amen.

QUESTION OF PERSONAL PRIVILEGE.

Mr. CROSSER. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. CROSSER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 10 minutes on a question of personal privilege. I do not care to consume an hour for that purpose.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to address the House on a question of personal privilege.

GOVERNMENT CONTROL OF TELEGRAPHS AND TELEPHONES.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Tennessee rise?

Mr. SIMS. I do not want to interfere with the question of personal privilege, but I want to ask unanimous consent that the House joint resolution 309 be taken up and considered under the general rules of the House. It is possible to pass it to-day. The resolution is to authorize the President during the war to take over the telegraphs and telephones.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. SIMS. Will not the gentleman withhold the objection for a moment?

Mr. MADDEN. No.

QUESTION OF PERSONAL PRIVILEGE.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CROSSER] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. CROSSER. Mr. Speaker, I am afraid I can not say in 10 minutes all I have to say, and therefore I ask unanimous consent to extend and revise my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CROSSER. Mr. Speaker, the Members of this House and the people whom we represent believe in justice and fair play, and are glad to listen to the exposure and rebuke of those who would wantonly destroy another's good name.

The publishers of the Cleveland Plain Dealer have directed against me a tirade of malignant abuse, to show the falsity of which, I consider a duty to myself and to the public.

In an editorial dated June 5, 1918, the Plain Dealer referred to me in the following language:

* * * CROSSER * * * obstructing the Government program. The Government has never been able to count on the support * * * of * * * CROSSER for any measure intended to push America's war against Prussianism.

In an editorial dated June 15, 1918, the following language will be found:

* * * CROSSER * * * an obstructionist in Congress, so far as questions of war efficiency are concerned.

Many other libelous statements as to myself are made in other issues of that paper.

These statements are unqualifiedly false. The records of Congress show nothing of the kind, and in making these statements the publishers of the Plain Dealer convict themselves of willful slander.

The records of Congress show that Congress has passed 134 war measures since the United States entered the war. I favored all of these except the draft. I believed in and advocated the volunteer plan for raising an army.

I have not in any way obstructed the passage of any legislation since the declaration of war or before, either by making dilatory motions, points of no quorum, or by making frequent or irrelevant speeches.

Every Member of the House knows these to be the facts.

Notwithstanding these facts, and in spite of the official record, the persons who publish the Plain Dealer have shown themselves so wanting in honor as to advertise me as disloyal.

But this is not all. The publishers of this paper, these men who have shown such a total lack of the sense of justice, these assassins of men's reputations have, true to their unfair methods, even charged me with playing into the hands of the enemy. They have not the manhood to go before the same audience with me to repeat these falsehoods.

Referring to the McLenmore resolution, President Wilson, on March 20, 1918, in a letter to Hon. Joseph W. Davies, who was a candidate for the United States Senate, said:

The McLemore resolution, the embargo issue, and the armed-neutrality measure presented the first opportunities to apply the "acid test" in our "country to disclose true loyalty and genuine Americanism."

In the same letter the President also said:

May I also add a word of thanks for your steadfast loyalty and patriotism during that trying period before we were thrust into the war, while, to avoid becoming involved therein, every effort was being made aggressively to assert and fearlessly to maintain American rights.

The Plain Dealer justified and supported the exact principles of the McLemore resolution. This it did in an editorial on February 15, 1916, a week before Congressman MCLEMORE introduced in the House his resolution, the effect of which would have been to prevent American citizens from exercising a legal right to travel on the high seas.

Doubtless it was arguments made by such papers as the Plain Dealer that induced Mr. MCLEMORE and others to support the McLemore resolution.

Tried, therefore, by the "acid test" laid down by the President, does it not inevitably follow that the Plain Dealer is disloyal and un-American? Alas! Alas! can it be that these "holier-than-thou" publishers are disloyal and have failed to show "genuine Americanism"?

I agreed with the views of the President on these questions, as my votes will show.

By the test stated by the President in his letter, the "acid test," I have a perfect record for "true loyalty and genuine Americanism."

If, however, I had followed the suggestion of the Plain Dealer in its editorial of February 15, 1916, I would not have passed with a clear record the "acid test."

With its record of failure to pass the "acid test," is it not a matter for wonder that the Plain Dealer, by its publishers, "pledges its best efforts" to defeat a Member of Congress who has stood perfect on the "acid test" of true loyalty and genuine Americanism?

Those who understand the game of the publishers of the Plain Dealer know that they have not continued to rant against me because I favored the volunteer plan for raising an army.

The publishers of the Plain Dealer are hostile to any man who opposes the special interests. They sit in the rooms of the millionaire clubs of Cleveland and sneer and slur and speak with contempt of those who dare champion the cause of the men who labor and sweat and struggle for a decent living for their wives and children. These worshipers of the golden calf swear vengeance upon and vow to destroy any Congressman who dares to defend, who tries to secure justice for, the laboring man. They want men in Congress who will do what they are told by the Plain Dealer.

In addition to this the proprietors and publishers of the Plain Dealer have been bitter against me because they did not succeed in defeating me in the primary election of 1914. My opponent at that election was Mr. R. J. Bulkley, a near relative of the principal owner of the Plain Dealer. I uttered not one unkind word against Mr. Bulkley in any speech, nor have I done so against any of my opponents. Mr. Bulkley was defeated, however, and it was enough that the owners and publishers of the Plain Dealer had failed to accomplish their purpose. From that time until now they have in mad frenzy sought my defeat.

Mr. CHURCH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CROSSER. Yes.

Mr. CHURCH. In claiming that you have supported Germany in this House, when, as a matter of fact, you have voted for every measure, as you state, that is considered a war measure at all, and voted favorably on it, with the exception of conscription, have not the editors of this paper made themselves liable to an action for criminal libel?

Mr. CROSSER. I do not think there is any doubt about it at all, but I do not care to trouble the House with a discussion of my plans in regard to that feature of the matter. I think, however, that the gentleman is entirely right in his conclusion.

I am not, however, the only man whom the publishers of the Plain Dealer have misrepresented and slandered. Indeed, Mr. Bulkley, their relative, has been the only Democrat in Congress from the twenty-first district, and, in fact, from Cleveland during the last 25 years, who has not been opposed by the publishers of this paper.

In 1894 Tom L. Johnson represented the twenty-first district in Congress and was a candidate for reelection. The Plain Dealer at that time, claiming intense devotion to the Democratic Party, printed scores of abusive and insulting editorials against Tom Johnson.

Let me read from a few of these editorials:

[From the Cleveland Plain Dealer, Oct. 18, 1894.]

He is a fake statesman without a policy, a fake politician without a party, and a fake prophet without a country. Tom Johnson is no more allied to Cleveland and its business than he is to the Democracy. He has betrayed both. * * * He will turn over his hand for nobody but himself. His smile is the smile of Judas and back of it lies treachery. He has proved a trickster and traitor on every public question and the interests of his district he has utterly ignored. His damnation lies in his own public record.

Tom Johnson plays the baby act when he complains that "personal attacks" are being made upon him. He ought to congratulate himself that he has thus far escaped as well as he has.

He has been inefficient as a representative of this great industrial and commercial city in procuring appropriations for public buildings.

[From the Cleveland Plain Dealer, Oct. 26, 1894.]

There is not a measure fought for by him that is not foreign to the spirit of American institutions. There is not one "reform" proposed by him that is not revolution. He is a political privateer who sails under a stolen flag hoisted only to deceive. He is a little fakir with two fads—both borrowed. There is not one of the doctrines he advocates which he originated or which he understands. With a superficial knowledge of economic subjects, he is seeking to turn to advantage the widespread socialistic spirit, and with the cheap tricks of the charlatan he caters to the crazy whims of the rabble.

[From the Cleveland Plain Dealer, Nov. 3, 1894.]

We attack the personality of Tom Johnson only so far as that is an issue in this canvass. He is not a Democrat and has no claim upon Democratic support.

To elect Johnson would elevate and strengthen Democracy's deadliest enemy and most arrant traitor in Cleveland.

The principles of Democracy are immortal. Tom Johnson, who arrays himself against them, will pass away—and he can't pass any too soon.

[From the Cleveland Plain Dealer, Nov. 5, 1894.]

A vote for Johnson is a vote for single tax, shinplaster science, and political faking.

[From the Cleveland Plain Dealer, Nov. 5, 1894.]

SOLELY FOR SELF.

Tom Johnson's canvass has been a personal one. * * * From first to last he has tooted his own horn. * * * He is willing to sacrifice all else for himself. * * * He is as much a traitor to the party in his canvass as he is in Congress. * * * The one in all the land to take the hand of the traitor here was a traitor from New York. * * * Tom Johnson stands before the people of Cleveland as the representative of all that is most contemptible in politics. * * * He has covered up from the crowd his ignorance by juggling and faking, and he has feigned deep learning through the flippant use of high-sounding phrases which he has stolen and does not understand. Cheap demagogue that he is, covered as he is with the contempt of the well informed and laughed at and despised as he is by his confreres in Congress, he is yet dangerous. * * * The election of Johnson would be an indorsement of his insult to President Cleveland, of his refusal to act with the Democrats in Congress. * * * It would be a defeat of all that Democracy holds to be for the best interest of the country and a triumph of treachery, cunning, and corruption.

After having said all this, the Plain Dealer, in closing its campaign against Tom Johnson, made the following sanctimonious statement on November 5, 1894, the day before election:

It is a crime against humanity to deceive the people.

Great Jehovah, what saints!

I shall not read further, but shall insert in the RECORD excerpts from some of these editorials.

Ah, Mr. Chairman, no more contemptible outrage could be committed on any man.

Some of you men in this House served here with Tom Johnson. You knew his lovable character, his lofty purpose to free the men who toil from the chains of injustice; you knew how unselfishly he fought to bring a better day to those who are weary worn with toil and care. Only a few of you now here, however, saw that valiant man in the battle for human rights; but there are thousands, yes, tens of thousands, of his loving and appreciative friends in Cleveland who knew him and saw him battle bravely and bravely die to liberate the great mass of the people who were crushed under the iron heel of special privilege.

And yet Tom Johnson, the champion of human rights, this man who was one of the noblest men and greatest officials I ever met; this untiring friend of the humble man, was hounded and tortured by the owners of the Plain Dealer as if he were the worst criminal in all the land. You ask why? Because he refused to do their bidding. [Applause.]

A few years ago the Plain Dealer denounced political bosses, but to-day its publishers are working hand in hand with the political bosses.

What the Plain Dealer wants is that we stand by the Plain Dealer; that we do its bidding; that we serve its special interests. We are to have no right to do any thinking for ourselves; we are not to question whether a thing is right or wrong. What the Plain Dealer and its friends, the bosses, want is a candidate for Congress who might be described in a paraphrase of the opera "Pinafore" about as follows:

He always voted at the bosses' call,
And never thought of thinking for himself at all.
He thought so little they rewarded him
By making him a slave to the bosses' whim.

[Applause.]

If the Plain Dealer had made its false statements because it did not have the opportunity to know the truth I might overlook them, although even then there would have been no excuse for its abuse. But the Plain Dealer had full opportunity to know the facts, and, notwithstanding, published the falsehoods. Men guilty of such acts are the meanest of all beings, whatever be their business or position in life.

No man in this House has been more anxious than I to see the United States successful in this awful struggle, not only because of my desire to see the flag of the United States wave triumphant over land and sea, as the emblem of a free people, ever the symbol of justice, never the sign of oppression, but also for the sake of the brave boys who fight to make government by consent of the people safe forever.

I know, and knew in the beginning, what would be the sufferings and sacrifices of our brave soldiers, and at every opportunity I have done my best to see that they are well provided for and well equipped. I eagerly helped to pass an amendment to the draft bill raising the soldiers' pay from $15 to $30 per month. The Plain Dealer said not one word in support of this amendment.

I voted for the soldiers' insurance bill and expect to vote for every bill that will make the lot of the soldier better. I have voted for every dollar asked for to carry on the war, and expect to continue to do so.

The Members of the House know these facts, and I mention them only to show the extent of the outrage committed by the persons who publish the Plain Dealer.

I know the Plain Dealer's purpose; I know its publisher's desires. Selfish as these are, I would not be impatient if they sought their accomplishment in a manly way. I did not during the campaign of 1914 utter in any speech any harsh criticism of the Plain Dealer. I knew that they were trying to elect their relative, Mr. Bulkley, and conceded their right to do so. But when the publishers of this paper, to help their interests, undertake to blacken my reputation, I shall strain every nerve to expose their unfair methods to the people. I have no wealth to leave when I quit this earthly scene, but I have always striven to leave a reputation which would be in every way honorable. Until this hour no man has ever dared in my presence to charge me with conduct dishonorable in public or private life. My life is an open book, and I defy them.

The publishers of the Plain Dealer, however, seem to act on the theory that if they repeat a falsehood often enough the people will believe it, because those whom they slander have no means of answering them. A few may thus be deceived, but honest and earnest men will become the more indignant when they learn the truth.

Wesley says:

Slanderers in ancient times have been marked in the forehead with a hot iron.

If the same punishment were administered to-day, the foreheads of the publishers of the Plain Dealer would be badly scorched.

I have said that all this slander in the name of patriotism is but a pretext. Those who publish the Plain Dealeer know, as we all know, that the people are devoted to the cause of their country. These designing men seeing, however, the enthusiasm of the people, seek to turn to their own advantage this patriotic zeal. They oppose men who antagonize private interests, and hope to discredit them by falsely making it appear that they are indifferent, if not opposed, to their country's welfare.

Special-privilege newspapers like the Plain Dealer hope by trying to monopolize the flag to destroy others by questioning their patriotism. You will notice, however, that the men whom they always attack are those who have been fighting against special privilege and for justice for the man who toils. Their purpose is plain. They hope when the war is over to have in Congress men who will do the bidding of special privilege and big business.

The Members of this Congress have had upon them the gravest responsibilities. The problems arising from this war have been extremely difficult indeed. Most of the men here have had long experience in Congress. Their experience and ability have been sorely tried by the problems and cares which have been put upon them since the war begun. And yet, midst these problems, during our death grapple with the enemy across the sea, the publishers of papers like the Plain Dealer have been barking and snapping at the heels of every man who, in order to defend the toiler against the wolves of special privilege, has had the courage to defy their threats and slanders.

If the day comes when, because of the threats and bullying of newspapers like the Plain Dealer, Members of Congress are afraid to speak and vote their honest convictions, then will the liberties of the people be lost.

The people will be helpless against the special-privilege crew, if, in order to serve their own interests, such men as the publishers of the Plain Dealer succeed in bulldozing public officials into obeying their orders.

Let us fight—yes, let us struggle to the utmost—to defeat the purpose of the enemy's powerful military machine, but let us also be ever watchful and constantly on guard against those men who, under pretext of helping to win the war, are trying to destroy those who oppose their efforts to enrich themselves from the toil of others. [Applause.]

I call attention to the following excerpts from the Plain Dealer:

[Tuesday, Oct. 2, 1894.]

AN ORGAN WORTHY THE FAKER.

It is quite fitting that Tomjohnson's only organ should be a cheap faker. It is natural, too, that the organ of one who announces far and wide through hired hands that he has "made the name of Cleveland known throughout the country" should do no little tooting of its own horn concerning its phenomenal enterprise and marvelous reliability as a news gatherer.

Of course, the conceited boasting of the organ should be kept up to the level of that of the great chief faker himself. Tomjohnson borrows his fads, and it is not surprising that his organ emulates his example to the extent of borrowing its news features. This the faker organ, the Puny Press, does constantly, making up its pages daily from the morning Plain Dealer.

[Thursday, Oct. 18, 1894.]

FOR NEITHER DEMOCRACY NOR THE TWENTY-FIRST DISTRICT.

The Democrats of the twenty-first congressional district are without a candidate. Johnson is no more a representative of the Democrats than he is of the Republicans or the Populists. He is an Individualist, whose political creed is made up of the rag-tag doctrines of all parties and the cardinal principles of none. All that he advocates is impractical and revolutionary, and all that has been shown in the experience of this and all other civilized nations to be wise and safe he opposes.

He is a fake statesman without a policy, a fake politician without a party, and a fake prophet without a country. He is as much out of place as a candidate in the twenty-first district as he is in the Democracy.

* * * * * * *

Tom Johnson is no more allied to Cleveland and its business interests than he is to the Democracy. He has betrayed both. He is an individualist in business as he is in politics. He will turn over his hand for no one but himself. His smile is the smile of Judas and back of it lies treachery. He has proved a trickster and a traitor on every party question, and the interests of his district he has utterly ignored. His damnation lies in his own public record.

[Friday, Oct. 26, 1894.]

THE INDIVIDUALIST.

Tomjohnson stands on his own platform, made to his order by his hired hands. There is not a single principle advocated by him that is not directly antagonistic to the principles of Democracy. There is not a measure fought for by him that is not foreign to the spirit of American institutions. There is not one "reform" proposed by him that is not revolution. He is a political privateer who sails under a stolen flag, hoisted only to deceive.

He is a little faker with two fads—both borrowed. There is not one of the doctrines he advocates which he originated or which he understands. With a superficial knowledge of economic subjects he is seeking to turn to his advantage the widespread socialistic spirit, and with the cheap tricks of a charlatan he caters to the crazy whims of the rabble.

To the discontented element, spawned in ignorance, intemperance, and laziness, to this element in Cleveland Tomjohnson has become a god. These are too ignorant to perceive that he is a god of brass, that his stuffing is only cheap bran, and that the fake halo at his head is but a wheel.

[Monday, Oct. 29, 1894.]

According to the Two Fads Fakir democracy wasn't in that contest at all. The principles of Jefferson, Madison, Jackson, Tilden, and Cleveland counted for nothing whatever. Henry George and Tomjohnson did it. Henry's book was the "most telling agency" and our own hefty hunk of conceit on end supplied the rest. At any rate that is Tomjohnson's opinion.

[Wednesday, Oct. 31, 1894.]

A MOST AWKWARD KICK.

The peanut editor of the Puny Press shows little grace and gratitude in abusing the Plain Dealer because we oppose Tomjohnson. The peanut editor must know that Tomjohnson said he wanted the opposition of the Plain Dealer.

* * * * * * *

Tomjohnson should love us. He should give us a vote of thanks. We submit to an impartial public the sincere proposition that Tomjohnson, in instructing his hired hands to call the Plain Dealer's obliging compliance with his wish a "senseless warfare" and a "personal difference" and "slandering" and to call the Plain Dealer a "moribund sheet" and call us a "journalistic cur" proves him an ingrate who betrays them that befriend him and is a traitor to them that trust him.

* * * * * * *

Since Tomjohnson desired the opposition of the Plain Dealer, and we are graciously disposed to give it to him, what has the Wild Ass of Seneca Street to do in it? Though he may realize that Tomjohnson made a most serious mistake, there are no dollars for the peanut editor in making a public confession of the fact.

[Thursday, Nov. 1, 1894.]

DEMOCRACY V. TOMJOHNSONISM.

The chief and self-sufficient reason why Democrats should not vote for Tom Johnson lies in the simple fact that he does not represent the principles of the party.

* * * * * * *

The Plain Dealer is for Democracy—American money and American taxation; Tomjohnson is for Tomjohnsonism—English money and Chinese tax. For a half century and more the Plain Dealer has been unwavering in its devotion to Democracy and asked nothing in return; to-day Tomjohnson thrusts himself into brief notoriety, spits on the platform, and asks election to Congress.

The party has not a more deadly enemy in the twenty-first district than this man who asks its suffrage. He gloats publicly over a claimed prospect of its dissolution. The power he hopes to have given him he will turn against it, as he has done in the past. This is the clean-cut issue between Democracy and Tomjohnsonism, and it can be settled only at the polls.

[Saturday, Nov. 3, 1894.]

To elect Tomjohnson would be to elevate and strengthen Democracy's deadliest enemy and most arrant traitor in Cleveland.

The principles of Democracy are immortal. Tomjohnson, who arrays himself against them, will pass away—and he can't pass any too soon.

We attack the personality of Tom Johnson only so far as that is an issue in his canvass. He is not a Democrat and has no claim upon Democratic support. * * *

The people of the twenty-first district will hardly indorse a man whose mouth is his platform.

[Monday, Nov. 5, 1894.]

SOLELY FOR SELF.

Tomjohnson's canvass has been a personal one, zealously conducted in his own personal interest. From first to last he has tooted his own horn. The spirit of his platform made to his order by his hired hands is this:

"Whereas I am, in my own estimation, wiser and greater than Democracy; and

"Whereas I have insulted the Democratic President, denounced the Democratic Congress, and condemned the Democratic tariff; and

"Whereas I advocate single tax, free trade, and a gold standard, in direct antagonism to Democratic principles: Therefore

"Resolved, That I am a brass God before whom the Democracy of Cleveland shall fall upon its knees with gratitude and worshipful adoration."

That his miserable fake methods and his unworthiness of support are recognized abroad as well as at home is proved in the fact that not a single Democratic leader in the whole country of loyalty and ability has come to help him. Those stanch Democrats and practical tariff reformers, Mills and McMillin, who have helped him heretofore, are working elsewhere, defending Democracy and advocating all that Judas Johnson is denouncing. The only man of reputation that has come is Thomas G. Shearman, who has divided his efforts for the last month between advocacy of Johnson in Cleveland and opposition to David B. Hill at home. The one in all the land to take the hand of the traitor here was a traitor from New York.

Tomjohnson stands before the people of Cleveland as the representative of all that is most contemptible in politics. He has no principles that are practical; he has not thoroughly discussed a single proposition of importance to the people; he has covered up from the crowd his ignorance by juggling and faking; and he has feigned deep learning through the flippant use of high-sounding phrases which he has stolen and does not understand.

Cheap demagogue that he is, covered as he is with the contempt of the well informed and laughed at and despised as he is by his confreres in Congress, he is yet dangerous. * * *

* * * He certainly is not gifted with good common sense if he believes these doctrines that he is preaching.

JOHNSON THE JUGGLER.

That Tomjohnson is a cheap demagogue whose "brilliancy" is mere outer show, like tinsel, to dazzle the ignorant, is shown in many of his public utterances. He talks of "scientific money" as though he has reduced the grave monetary problem to fixed laws and all that were needed to insure a money millennium is his reelection.

* * * * * * *

As a matter of fact Johnson has no thoroughly settled views on any question. He does not think for himself, and all his speeches in Congress and on the stump are but the parrotlike repetition of theories picked up from Henry George and others of his ilk. He can not reason from cause to effect or from effect to cause. His show of profound learning on economic questions is assumed to conceal his ignorance of fundamental principles. He was cut out too small by half for a statesman, even of the mediocre sort.

[Tuesday, Nov. 6, 1894.]

THE POLITICAL QUACK.

Tom Johnson has proved himself an unsafe political doctor.

* * * * * * *

In this emergency the quack decides that good, old-fashioned Democracy is to strong for the public stomach, hence he prepares and presents a political "hell broth," composed of cranks' brains, wild cats' heads, vampires' claws, gudgeons' eyes, pennyroyal, and mullein, which he has administered in copious doses from his field hospital, but the pains have increased and the medicine has continued to work both ways, like the old lady's peach tree bark—"either way, owin' to how ye scrape the bark, up 'er down."

Remember that Johnson has been thoroughly tried and found thoroughly unfaithful.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Tulley, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 12600) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, and prior years, on account of war expenses and for other purposes, had insisted upon its amendments disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. MARTIN, Mr. UNDERWOOD, and Mr. WARREN as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, July 3, 1918.

Hon. CHAMP CLARK,
Speaker House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. SPEAKER: I request consent to be excused for one week on account of sickness in my family.

Yours, truly, HENRY A. CLARK.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the request will be granted.

There was no objection.

PENSIONS FOR WIDOWS AND MINOR CHILDREN, SPANISH WAR SOLDIERS.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Colorado rise?

Mr. KEATING. I desire to ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill S. 4444, with the understanding that it will not be permitted to interfere with the consideration of conference reports and other matters of immediate moment.

This bill, I want to say to the House, is a bill to pension the widows and minor children of the officers and enlisted men who served in the War with Spain. On three different occasions it has passed the House, namely, in the Sixty-second, Sixty-third, and Sixty-fourth Congresses. On the last occasion it passed without a roll call. The chairman of the Committee on Pensions is very anxious that it should be considered before we take a recess.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING] asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill to which he refers.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas objects, and that is the end of it.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman withhold his objection?

Mr. GARNER. Ordinarily I would be glad to withhold it for any statement that any gentleman desires to make, but it is a matter calling for immediate attention, and it does not meet my opinion in the premises. I will withhold it for a statement, however.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I wish the gentleman would withhold it.

Mr. GARNER. I will withhold it for two minutes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Texas says he will withhold for two minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent for two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. It is true, as the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING] says, that the chairman of the committee [Mr. KEY], who can not be here to-day, is exceedingly anxious that the bill shall be acted upon before we take a recess. I saw him yesterday, and he so told me. Also, as the gentleman from Colorado says, this bill has passed the House three times, and three times has it been stopped in the Senate. But now it comes here by a unanimous vote of the Senate. It is a bill that will do justice to a lot of deserving women. It will not apply to those who marry Spanish War veterans after the bill becomes a law. It is in every way meritorious, and inasmuch as the House has three times passed it and now the Senate has passed it, it does seem to me that no gentleman should now object to its fair consideration on its merits on this floor. I regret exceedingly that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] should interpose an objection to so just a measure.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, may I have just a moment?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. This is one pension bill that is neither partisan nor sectional in its nature. The Spanish-American War veterans come from all over the United States. But I do not believe it is a war measure, and I have persistently and consistently voted against every proposition, except one local in its character, that Congress has considered since the war began. I believe that this Congress ought to confine itself to measures for war purposes, and that is the reason why I object to this, and shall object to other measures that are not war measures.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman answer this question: Why should not the widow of a man who fought for our flag in the Spanish-American War be pensioned as is the widow of a man who fought in the War with Mexico or in the Civil War? Justice demands that she have this recognition and the Congress ought to grant it. [Applause.]

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the river and harbor bill.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The gentleman from Texas did not renew his objection, Mr. Speaker. I hope he will not renew it.

The SPEAKER. Yes; he objected when he made his speech.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. Evidently there is not.

CALL OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. SMALL. I move a call of the House, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina moves a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll. This roll call is to get a quorum, and the answer is "present."

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER. On this roll call 218 gentlemen, a quorum, have answered to their names.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend further proceedings under the call.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky moves to suspend further proceedings under the call. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing an article by Secretary Lane entitled "The answer of the foreign-born"—a very beautiful thing.

The SPEAKER. What is it? A poem or a speech, or what?

Mr. SINNOTT. It is a prose poem by Secretary Lane; lofty and patriotic in thought, in chaste and simple diction.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oregon asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing an article by Secretary Lane. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. DENT rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Alabama rise?

Mr. DENT. I rise for the purpose of asking unanimous consent to print in the RECORD to-morrow morning the conference report on the Army appropriation bill (H. R. 12281), in the event the conferees agree after the House adjourns this afternoon.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to print in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the conference report on the Army appropriation bill any time between now and midnight. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Speaker, I now call up the conference report on the river and harbor bill (H. R. 10069).

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is recognized for an hour.

Mr. SMALL. The report represents an agreement upon all the Senate amendments except Nos. 1 and 2, which increase the appropriation for Mobile Harbor and Bar.

Mr. GRAY of Alabama. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Alabama rise?

Mr. GRAY of Alabama. I have a preferential motion.

The SPEAKER. The time has not come to make that motion.

Mr. GRAY of Alabama. I thought the gentleman from North Carolina had made his motion.

The SPEAKER. If so, the Chair did not hear it.

Mr. SMALL. I made no motion, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will let the gentleman from Alabama know.

Mr. SMALL. There are 11 Senate amendments, and the conference report represents an agreement on all these amendments except Nos. 1 and 2. Senate amendments Nos. 1 and 2 apply simply to one project, an increased appropriation for Mobile Harbor. Unless some gentleman desires to ask some question about these amendments about which there is an agreement, I shall move to adopt the conference report as to those particular amendments.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will inquire how many amendments are still outstanding.

Mr. SMALL. Only amendments 1 and 2.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Speaker, I understand that the provision relating to the excluding of mine water from navigable streams and the tributaries thereof has been eliminated entirely from the bill. Will the gentleman in charge of the bill inform me whether that understanding is correct?

Mr. SMALL. The Senate receded from that particular amendment, so that it will not appear in the bill.

Mr. ROBBINS. Will the gentleman yield me a few moments to speak on the bearing that that provision had on bituminous-coal production?

Mr. MADDEN. I hope the gentleman will not take the time of the House now.

Mr. SMALL. What is the least time the gentleman will be satisfied with?

Mr. ROBBINS. Five minutes.

Mr. SMALL. I suggest that the gentleman get the consent of the House at another time.

Mr. TREADWAY. May I ask the chairman of the committee one question?

Mr. SMALL. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. TREADWAY. I understood the gentleman, in answer to the question of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ROBBINS] to say that all reference to the amendment relative to mine water has been eliminated from the bill; that is, that there will be no investigation by the Secretary of War authorized on that subject.

Mr. SMALL. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. ROBBINS. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of coal and of mine drainage.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SMALL. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. In the statement presented by the conferees and printed in the RECORD in reference to the conference report no reasons are given why they could not agree with the Senate on the items relative to Mobile Bay. Will the gentleman make a brief statement to the House about that?

Mr. SMALL. I would like first to dispose of the amendments as to which there is an agreement.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report amendment No. 1.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment No. 1: Page 8, line 8, strike out "$200,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$340,000."

The SPEAKER. Is that the Mobile item?

Mr. SMALL. That is the Mobile item.

Mr. GRAY of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House recede and concur in this Senate amendment.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SMALL. I think I have the floor.

The SPEAKER. Of course the gentleman has the floor.

Mr. SMALL. I have not made any motion about this amendment. When I do the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. GRAY] can submit his motion.

The SPEAKER. He has already made his motion.

Mr. SMALL. That, I understand, is a preferential motion.

The SPEAKER. Yes. The Chair will state the motion of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. GRAY]. He moves that the House recede from its disagreement to Senate amendment No. 1 and concur in the same.

Mr. SMALL. Amendments Nos. 1 and 2 both relate to the same matter.

The SPEAKER. Do they both have reference to Mobile Harbor?

Mr. SMALL. They do.

The SPEAKER. They can both be considered at once, then.

Mr. SMALL. I would like the attention of the House while I make a brief statement regarding these Senate amendments 1 and 2 which increase the appropriation for Mobile Harbor. There was appropriated in the river and harbor bill as it passed the House a total of $360,000 for Mobile Harbor and Bar, $160,000 for maintenance and $200,000 for further improvement. The further improvement is based upon a new project carried in the last river and harbor act, which new project will increase the depth in Mobile channel from 27 feet to 30 feet, and the depth over the bar from 30 feet to 33 feet. The bill as it passed the House carried $200,000 toward that improvement. The Senate increased that sum to $340,000, so that the total appropriation is increased from $360,000 to $500,000.

The controlling fact about the appropriations for Mobile Harbor is this, that the sum of $360,000 appropriated in the House bill is all that was recommended by the Chief of Engineers and is all that he can use, and if any amount additional to $360,000 is given it will be unasked for, with no estimate submitted for it, and it can not be used.

Mr. MADDEN. What is the purpose of this $140,000 increase? What is it said to be proposed to be used for?

Mr. SMALL. It is said it is to be used for the improvement, but it might as well have been increased to $600,000 or $1,000,000. One would be just as consistent as the other. The Rivers and Harbors Committee gave prolonged consideration to this project of the maintenance and improvement of Mobile Harbor. An increased appropriation was insisted upon. A delegation of intelligent citizens from the city of Mobile appeared before the committee urging that the appropriation be increased, and the committee were liberal and courteous in affording every opportunity to our colleague upon the committee who represents the Mobile district [Mr. GRAY] and to every other person interested in an increased appropriation, in order that they might submit any substantial reason why the appropriation should be increased. They went to the Shipping Board with the approval of the committee, and with the statement that if the Shipping Board would represent an increased appropriation to be a war necessity and so recommend to the Secretary of War, and if it had his approval the committee would give favorable consideration to an increased appropriation; but after some correspondence a letter was submitted by Mr. Edward F. Carry, director of operations, United States Shipping Board, who said that he could not recommend it as a war necessity.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SMALL. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Are there any other items in this bill that appropriate more money than is recommended by the engineers?

Mr. SMALL. There is not a single appropriation in the bill which exceeds the estimate submitted by the Chief of Engineers. I may say at this moment that there appeared before the committee a number of distinguished Members of this House and a number of delegations from various sections of the country who had for one reason or another come to the conclusion that the estimates submitted by the Chief of Engineers was not adequate, and asked the committee to give an increased appropriation, and even a larger number came to the chairman of the committee, and to each of them was made the statement that it was the policy of the committee to consider the estimates submitted by the Chief of Engineers as presumptively correct and as being all that could profitably be expended, and that the burden was on them to show the contrary. Every one of these gentlemen submitted to this policy of the committee and, as we supposed, the policy of Congress, except the gentlemen advocating this increased appropriation for Mobile Harbor.

Mr. BENJAMIN L. FAIRCHILD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMALL. Yes.

Mr. BENJAMIN L. FAIRCHILD. What depth is provided by this appropriation of $360,000?

Mr. SMALL. We adopted in the last river and harbor act a new project for Mobile Harbor increasing the depth in the channel from 27 feet to 30 feet and on the bar from 30 to 33 feet.

Mr. BENJAMIN L. FAIRCHILD. Does the increased appropriation contemplate any increase in depth?

Mr. SMALL. No.

Mr. LAZARO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMALL. Yes.

Mr. LAZARO. If I understand the chairman, when the bill was framed and went before the House the House followed the policy of the War Department that we should enact war measures only, but the Senate adopted another view of it and went outside and attached this proposition to the bill. Is it not a fact that a good many projects on this side which were considered worthy were turned down by the committee and by the House on the ground that the gentleman had indicated that they were not war measures?

Mr. SMALL. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMALL. I will.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. How long will it take to finally complete the project the best that can be done?

Mr. SMALL. That depends on how rapidly the work can proceed and how much shall be appropriated each year.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. My understanding was that there was no possible way to finish it so that it would be of benefit at any time during the time that the war is expected to last.

Mr. SMALL. Let us take a period of one year. It is in evidence from the Chief of Engineers that if Congress should appropriate all the money to complete the project within a year, even if it were possible to do so, it would cost twice as much as the original estimate, and they did not know where they would get dredges and other appliances to do the work. The condition is this: This is all the money which can be spent during the next fiscal year.

Coming back to the suggestion that there is no other project in the bill carrying in excess of the estimates of the engineers I may illustrate by citing the case of Brunswick Harbor. The gentleman who represents Brunswick Harbor, Mr. WALKER, came before the committee and before the chairman, and when he was told what the policy of the committee was, and that Brunswick Harbor would be given the appropriation which was estimated could be profitably used and no more, he yielded, just as other Members of the House had yielded, to that wise policy of the committee, and as I take it, of the House. This amendment increasing this appropriation came before the Committee of the Whole when the bill was under consideration. The committee declined to increase the appropriation and so it is not a new proposition.

Mr. WHEELER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMALL. Yes.

Mr. WHEELER. Did the Senate conferees give any good reason why this increased appropriation should be embodied in this bill?

Mr. SMALL. I may say, if I can with propriety, that no reason has been submitted to the conferees for this increased appropriation. I may say also, because it is a public matter, that in the printed hearings of the Senate Committee on Commerce in their preparation of this bill the opinion of the representative of the Chief of Engineers, Col. Newcomer, about the necessity of an increased appropriation was not asked.

Mr. TREADWAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMALL. Yes.

Mr. TREADWAY. Did the delegation that waited on the River and Harbor Committee from Mobile designate for what purpose this increase would be used if granted? In view of the fact that it is stated that $360,000 is the limit that can possibly be used before the preparation of another river and harbor bill, I think the use that the additional $140,000 might be put to would be illuminating if the gentleman could state it.

Mr. SMALL. This work must be done by Government dredges. It is impossible to have it done by contract, because it will cost 100 per cent more if any contract could be obtained, which is improbable. Unless the cost by contract can be brought within 25 per cent in excess of what it would cost by Government plant it comes within the inhibition of the law and could not be done by contract. So that it being as certain as anything can be that the work must be done by Government plant and it being impossible to obtain Government dredges to expend more than this amount of money, any increased appropriation could not be used. It is certainly bad policy to appropriate money which can not be used during the fiscal year.

I might say, since the gentleman from Massachusetts asked the question, that in the last bill we adopted a new project for Boston Harbor at the same time we adopted the new project for the Mobile Harbor, and in the wisdom of the engineers they did not submit an estimate of one penny toward the new project, and yet Boston is not here protesting and seeking to amend the bill. And there were numerous other projects throughout the country to which the same statement might be applied.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMALL. Yes.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. The $200,000 appropriated in the bill is for deepening the channel, is it not?

Mr. SMALL. Yes.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. And any amount added thereto would be for the same purpose?

Mr. SMALL. I suppose so.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. So any addition to this appropriation would be used for the same purpose as the $200,000 now carried by the bill is intended to be used for. May I ask another question? The gentleman stated with some degree of positiveness that private dredge companies could not be depended on to do any work of this kind for the Government. I will ask if the appropriation carried by the bill is not liberal enough to justify contracts being awarded hereafter to private dredge companies in which you say they shall be allowed 25 per cent increase over what the Government estimates it could do the work for, and all permanent investments on the part of the Government are to be taken into account, interest charges placed thereon, to determine what it costs the Government for doing the work?

Mr. SMALL. The gentleman probably did not hear the statement I made a moment ago. The Chief of Engineers stated that it is impossible to do this work by contract because it will cost more than 25 per cent in excess of the cost by Government plant; that the work must be done by Government plant; and that he can not spend more than $360,000 in the work of improvement by Government plant. That is the controlling fact in the matter.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMALL. Yes.

Mr. FREAR. Was it not stated before the committee that, providing the gentleman from Mobile could offer any private contract, the committee would take that under advisement and do whatever they could to expedite matters, and that the whole proposition was ignored, and no one ever appeared before the committee, and is it not equally true that at least 30 or 40 projects equally meritorious were presented to the committee and were turned down because they were new projects and not war measures?

Mr. SMALL. The gentleman is correct. Ample opportunity has been given the gentlemen interested in this improvement to bring any further evidence of that character before the committee.

Mr. GRAY of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMALL. Yes.

Mr. GRAY of Alabama. The gentleman does not mean to say that this is a new project? Was not this project adopted in the last river and harbor appropriation bill?

Mr. SMALL. Nothing I have said would lead to the inference that this is a new project, because I said several times that it was adopted in the last river and harbor appropriation act.

Mr. FREAR. But for the first time in all history it was adopted without one dollar being appropriated, as we all know.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Speaker, in the report recommending this project which we adopted in the last river and harbor act, there was a condition imposed that provided that no work could be done under the new project until local interests have established pilotage charges and port regulations satisfactory to the Secretary of War and had submitted acceptable plans for the development of adequate terminal facilities and had given assurance to the Secretary of War that these terminal facilities would be provided within a reasonable time. As the bill passed the House at the last session, it passed with those conditions, but when it went to the other body that body adopted an amendment striking out those conditions and against the judgment of your conferees at that time, in order to get a river and harbor bill, we yielded to the conferees of the other body and this project was adopted in the last river and harbor act with those conditions eliminated.

It was not right that they should have been eliminated at a time when everyone with any knowledge of river and harbor improvements realized that they are made for the purpose of promoting commerce, and that commerce can not be promoted without adequate terminal facilities; and now, when we come with an appropriation for this project in this bill—and I am not speaking unkindly but am simply stating facts—we have another amendment seeking to differentiate Mobile Harbor from every other project within the country.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMALL. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. When this bill was before the House, I recall distinctly one or two efforts were made to secure appropriations upon the ground that they were or were not approved by the President or the Secretary of War as war measures. The committee, as I recall, adhered to the policy of putting nothing in the bill that was not approved by the Secretary of War as a war measure. Is there any evidence before the committee that the President or the Secretary of War approved of this appropriation, advanced from $360,000 in the House bill to $500,000 as proposed by the Senate, which would justify that raise upon the ground of war necessity?

Mr. SMALL. Absolutely nothing from the War Department; and in that connection I would like to make this statement: On Friday last, I think it was, the Secretary of War sent a phone message to me to the effect that he wished further consideration of the river and harbor bill by the conferees held up until he could see the chairman of the House committee. At a later time the Secretary requested me to call upon him, which I did; and at that time he stated that the distinguished gentleman, Mr. DENT, chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, and the distinguished gentleman, Mr. GRAY of Alabama, had been to him insisting that he should give approval to this increased appropriation. He said to me that he had made careful investigation of the matter and wished to say to me that he could not give his approval, and he gave me a copy of a letter which he said he had mailed on July 2 to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. GRAY], which letter I shall now read to the House:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, July 2, 1918.

MY DEAR MR. SMALL: I beg to inclose you copy of letter which I have sent to Representative OSCAR L. GRAY.

Cordially, yours,
NEWTON D. BAKER,
Secretary of War.

Hon. J. H. SMALL,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, July 2, 1918.

Hon. OSCAR L. GRAY,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. GRAY: After your call on me the other day, Gen. Black reported to me that upon careful consideration the engineers were satisfied that they could not profitably use in Mobile Harbor and Bay the moneys provided by the Senate amendment increasing the appropriation for continuing the improvement there from $360,000 to a total of $500,000. I have therefore felt constrained to say to Mr. SMALL that the War Department did not recommend the added amount. My situation in this regard I am sure you will realize from the fact that the War Department and the House Committee have cooperated to restrain the appropriations for rivers and harbors to those amounts which could be profitably expended and to be properly regarded as war measures. Many very useful projects have under these restrictions been negatived, and a strict adherence to the rules which have guided us in the consideration of other projects is the only fair course for us to take, with regard to the amounts of those projects which in some degree we are satisfied ought to be considered at this time.

Cordially, yours,
NEWTON D. BAKER,
Secretary of War.

Before that letter came to me I also called up the Chief of Engineers, and asked him if any conditions had recently arisen which would justify this increased appropriation for Mobile Harbor, and I have letter from him dated July 3, which I shall now read to the House:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF ENGINEERS,
Washington, July 3, 1918.

Hon. JOHN H. SMALL,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. SMALL: In response to your oral inquiry concerning the increase made by the Senate in the item for Mobile Harbor in the pending river and harbor bill, I have the honor to state that this increase was not based on any estimate submitted by me. The amount that could be used to advantage in this harbor during the coming year was given very careful consideration when the river and harbor bill was being prepared by your committee, and the sum of $360,000, finally recommended, was included in the bill as it passed the House. This amount was estimated to provide for the maximum use that it was expected could be made of Government dredges on the channels of Mobile Harbor until the next annual river and harbor appropriations should become available. With the present extraordinary demand for dredging in connection with the various war activities, there is no prospect of being able to do any of this work by contract under the legal limitation that the cost of contract work shall not be more than 25 per cent in excess of the cost of doing the work with Government plant. There are other operations, indeed, in Mobile Harbor that are not subject to this limitation that are unable to secure private dredges.

2. Since the above estimate of $360,000 was made the changes in the situation are not such as to indicate any probability that more than this amount will be needed. It has been found necessary to divert one of the Government dredges to some necessary work at one of the shipbuilding plants, and the Emergency Fleet Corporation has just made an urgent request that a Government dredge also do about 600,000 cubic yards of additional dredging that is required in connection with the yard that the corporation is going to establish at Mobile for the construction of concrete ships. These other operations, of course, are not at the expense of river and harbor funds. They are even more essential than greater depth in the channel and they very materially reduce the time that the dredges can be employed on the Government channel work. Moreover, the delay in passing the river and harbor bill has materially shortened the time that might have been available for the expenditure of the funds that it carries.

3. In view of these conditions and of the policy adopted by the department of reducing its estimates to the lowest limits deemed compatible with a due regard to the essential interests to be served during the war, I do not feel warranted in recommending an arbitrary increase from $360,000 to $500,000 in the appropriation for Mobile Harbor.

Yours, very truly,
W. M. BLACK,
Major General, Chief of Engineers.

Mr. Speaker, I have only this to say in addition: I have no disposition in the slightest to disparage Mobile Harbor. I could say something on that subject if any comparisons are desired, but I do not wish to do so. I have the very kindliest sentiment for this harbor. It has my good wishes for the promotion of its commerce. Perhaps it is fortunate that this is a southern project, because no charge of sectionalism can be brought against me for my opposition to this increased appropriation. I am making a presentation to you solely from a sense of duty, believing this increased appropriation ought not to be added to this bill. I and the other members of your committee are but the servants of the House. It is for the House to say, under the circumstances, whether they will vote for this increased appropriation. If they do so, it is well to reiterate this: They will make an increased appropriation that is not asked for, that can not be used, that will be unjust to every other project in the United States. [Applause.] Mr. Speaker, I reserve the remainder of my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has an hour. Does he desire to yield to any gentleman?

Mr. SMALL. I am ready to yield to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. GRAY].

The SPEAKER. How much times does the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMALL. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama—how much time?

Mr. GRAY of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GRAY of Alabama. Am I not entitled to an hour under my motion?

The SPEAKER. Yes; the Chair believes the gentleman is.

Mr. SMALL. How much time—I have not yielded the floor, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The Chair knows the gentleman has not yielded the floor.

Mr. SMALL. Then I move the previous question if no gentleman wishes time——

The SPEAKER. No; the gentleman is entitled to his time.

Mr. SMALL. I am going to yield to the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. How much time does the gentleman wish?

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. FOSTER. Is a Member who makes a motion to concur in an amendment entitled to an hour, the same as the Member who has charge of the bill?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a further parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. Let us get through with one at a time. The Chair thinks the gentleman from Alabama is entitled to an hour if he wants it.

Mr. SMALL. If the Speaker will hear me——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Illinois rise?

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, my recollection of the rule is, as this is a conference report, that the chairman of the conference committee, in this instance the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL], is entitled to an hour and to move the previous question at any time within that hour; otherwise the previous question could not operate if, as a matter of right, the gentleman on the other side was recognized for an hour. I think I am not mistaken in my recollection that that is the rule.

The SPEAKER. The general rule is that a man in charge of a bill has an hour. The general practice is that he yields a reasonable part of his time to the opposition, but he controls the situation.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, if the Chair heeded entirely what the gentleman from Illinois suggested to the Chair, the result of the ruling just made by the Chair——

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not make any ruling; he said he thought so.

Mr. GARNER. I am glad to hear the Speaker say he has not.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. To ask the Chair if the Chair is sure he recognized the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. GRAY]?

The SPEAKER. If the Chair is certain he did what?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If the Chair is sure that he recognized the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. GRAY].

The SPEAKER. He is sure that he did not recognize him except to ask for what purpose he rose.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Would not that answer the question whether Mr. GRAY had an hour in his own right? The rule is that the chairman of the committee has an hour and can move the previous question within that time.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, if I may be allowed, my understanding is that the gentleman from North Carolina in charge of the conference report yielded to the gentleman from Alabama to make a motion to recede and concur but did not yield the floor except for that purpose.

Mr. CANNON. He has a right to make that motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina never lost the floor.

Mr. MADDEN. Then the gentleman from Alabama has no time.

The SPEAKER. How much time is the gentleman from North Carolina willing to yield to the gentleman from Alabama?

Mr. SMALL. If I can get the gentleman's attention, I desire to ask him how much time he desires.

Mr. GRAY of Alabama. First, I want the Speaker to rule whether or not I am not entitled to an hour in my own right.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Speaker, I do not yield to the gentleman unless to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina has an absolute right to make the motion for the previous question at any time within his hour.

Mr. GRAY of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, is it not a fact that my motion to concur is a preferential motion?

The SPEAKER. Of course it is or the gentleman could not have made it.

Mr. GRAY of Alabama. As a matter of right, am I not entitled to speak upon my motion?

The SPEAKER. Why, all that the Chair cares about it one way or the other is to get through with it, and the gentleman from North Carolina is willing to yield time to the gentleman, if that is enough.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Speaker, how much time does the gentleman desire? Mr. Speaker, how much of the hour have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has 35 minutes remaining.

Mr. SMALL. I am willing to yield part of that time.

The SPEAKER. How much time does the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAY of Alabama. I would like to have at least an hour. Several gentlemen want to speak on it.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Speaker, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Will the gentleman yield me 10 minutes?

Mr. SMALL. Yes; I will yield to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OLIVER] 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The reason the Chair took the liberty of making the suggestion is this: Of course, everybody understands the situation we are in here. Members want to get home, and Members are going home, recess or no recess, and we know on this last roll call we just barely did escape through with an exact quorum, and under those circumstances the Chair felt that he was entitled, without hurting anybody's feelings, to suggest that we hurry up with these things.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I recall that the other day, when we had up the naval conference report, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER] made the motion to nonconcur, and the Chair ruled that Mr. BUTLER had an hour on his motion.

The SPEAKER. The Chair knows he did.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I know that has been done on several occasions, and I simply was anxious to know what the ruling of the Chair was.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will suggest a way out of it. The Chair does not desire to make an offhand ruling. While the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. GRAY] is proceeding with his 15 minutes, in the meantime the Chair will examine the matter—it is rather a delicate one and a rather important one, too—and then, if it turns out that the gentleman is entitled to his hour, the Chair will take this 15 minutes which has been yielded him by the gentleman from North Carolina and give it back to the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. GRAY of Alabama. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, it will be necessary to go back just a little and review this matter so that you may understand it.

When the Mobile item came up before our committee it was known that the Board of Army Engineers had originally recommended $850,000 for Mobile Harbor; that is, $850,000 on a new 30-foot project. We adopted the 30-foot project that was in the last bill, carrying no appropriation, as has been stated by the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors. Not a dollar was appropriated, and there is scarcely any balance now to the credit of the fund for maintenance or improvement of the harbor. When we came to consider the bill and the item which is now under consideration at this session the Board of Army Engineers had recommended $250,000 for Mobile. Now, understand that we had declared in the last bill, which became the law, that it was a war emergency. There is no question about that. And the Mobile item is before you now as a war emergency, declared so by the Board of Army Engineers.

They had completed their work; they had surveyed this channel; they had come to Congress with their report, and said: "Your project is a worthy one"; they said it was a war emergency; and now, gentlemen, it seems to me we ought to have something to say as to how much money we ought to appropriate.

It is a war emergency, and since we considered it in committee things have occurred at Mobile of vast importance at this time. I was directed by the committee of which I have the honor to be a member, when this matter came up for consideration, and the chairman remembers it well, to go to certain activities, like the Shipping Board and others, and if I could get from them certain recommendations this would be considered favorably by the committee. And it was intimated strongly, in fact it was said absolutely, that if we got these recommendations the increased appropriation would be given. I did as was suggested, and went to these various activities of the Government.

Others who are interested in this project sought to get recommendations and to see whether or not this was really a war emergency and if it was necessary to spend more money on the project at this time. I have here a letter addressed to the Chief of Engineers signed by Cyrus Garnsey, jr., Assistant United States Fuel Administrator, which I will embody in the RECORD. He thinks it is very necessary that this channel should be deepened quickly to a depth of 30 feet:

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 29, 1918.

CHIEF OF ENGINEERS,
United States Army, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Our attention has been called to the great importance of speedy improvement of harbor and channel at Mobile, Ala.

We are also advised that the Government is preparing to take over the Black Warrior River and put a fleet of coal barges on for the purpose of carrying large quantities of coal on the river from the Birmingham district to the port of Mobile.

Large quantities of first-class bunker coal, as well as steam coal, can thereby be transported over the river. There are three private shipping yards in operation besides the very large shipping yard being built by the steel corporation.

We understand that in the last few days Mobile has been selected as a point for the establishment of a concrete-shipping yard, and we regard Mobile as one of the best ports on the Gulf or on the Atlantic for the establishment of a large coaling station, with the view of bunkering ships and exporting coal.

Through the harbor of Mobile New Orleans will receive a supply of bunkering and steam coal, and Cuba needs a large tonnage of coal in order to carry on its sugar-refining business.

I express the hope that the engineering department will see their way clear to suggest to the conferees, who are now considering the river and harbor bill, that the speedy improvement of harbor and deepening of channel at Mobile is urgent.

Very truly, yours,

CYRUS GARNSEY, Jr.,
Assistant United States Fuel Administrator.

Also one from the chairman of the Shipping Board:

UNITED STATES SHIPPING BOARD,
Washington, June 7, 1918.

Hon. OSCAR L. GRAY,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: Referring to our interview in regard to the port of Mobile.

It is a fact that since we last discussed this port there has been a change in the activities pertaining to it. The Fuel Administration will use Mobile to a greater extent than heretofore and much coal will go from that port.

I understand that the Railroad Administration plans to utilize Mobile to relieve the congestion in other ports, and if that is the case there is no question about the wisdom of dredging the channel of Mobile to a depth of 30 feet, so that most any ship in the South American or West India trade, or even the trans-Atlantic service, can enter the harbor of Mobile with cargo.

Deepening the channel would remove the necessity of picking out, as it were, ships suitable for this harbor.

I have ignored the shipbuilding activity and have touched only upon the more vital necessities.

Very truly, yours, EDWARD N. HURLEY, Chairman.

You will observe Mr. Hurley says it is necessary for the Government to pick out, as it were, vessels suitable to enter that harbor. There may be others convenient carrying 30 feet, and yet they must go somewhere else; they must pass Mobile by, because they can not get into that harbor at this time.

I have a communication from Mr. Le Blanc, who is manager of two large shipping concerns in Mobile. The telegram says:

MOBILE, ALA., July 2, 1918.

Hon. OSCAR L. GRAY,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.:

Yours of date. Very hard to tell number vessels drawing 30 feet that could not enter Mobile Harbor during past year, owing to fact they were not sent to Mobile, because they could not load full here; but that this is true is evidenced by letter of May 22 from Harrison Line, Liverpool, reading: "We are sorry we could not put a June steamer forward for Mobile, but will try to find one for July. There would be less difficulty in doing this if Mobile Channel were deeper." This is sample of what other owners are experiencing. Out of 44 vessels in Leyland Line fleet, only 14 can load full cargoes at Mobile, owing to draft and impossibility of supplying tonnage, even. Out of 14 is shown by their having sent 3 vessels here that had to complete elsewhere, owing draft loaded. About same proportions apply Harrison Line fleet, 50 vessels. Nubian, which just sailed, not only had to load 1,000 tons cargo elsewhere, but also 600 tons bunkers, and drew 26 feet 10 inches, anyway.

MOBILE LINERS.

In other words, these great steamship companies can not get into this harbor, although they are clamoring to do so, and are trying to do so every day.

I will read from the United States Railroad Administration, directly under W. G. McAdoo, Director General, a communication from Mr. Buxton, assistant director:

UNITED STATES RAILROAD ADMINISTRATION,
Washington, June 24, 1918.

Hon. OSCAR L. GRAY,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. GRAY: Referring to your favor of the 24th, inclosing copy of a letter from Chairman Hurley, of the United States Shipping Board, relative to the importance of dredging the channel at Mobile, Ala.

Since last fall Mr. Chambers has insisted that the Gulf and South Atlantic ports be used to a greater extent for export shipments. Our own Government and the allies have cooperated in doing this to relieve the congested situation at the northern range of Atlantic ports.

Mobile, as one of the more important Gulf ports, has been used to a degree, but was limited on account of inability to take care of ocean-going vessels drawing more than 27 feet. There is no question but that the port of Mobile would be used to a greater extent if the contemplated improvements would accommodate vessels of a greater draft, and, naturally, the sooner this is accomplished the better it will be for the port.

For your information at the present time the following tonnage is at Mobile for export:

Five hundred and fifty-seven cars for United States Government.
Five hundred and ninety-six cars for British Government.
Three hundred and eighty-six cars for commercial export.
This exclusive of grain in elevators.

I have referred your letter to the Exports Control Committee, the personnel and object of which is fully explained in the attached circular. They will hold their initial meeting in Washington, Wednesday, the 26th.

Yours, very truly, C. B. BUXTON,
Assistant Director.

I have in my hand the personnel of that exports control committee, and among the members is Mr. P. A. S. Franklin, the same gentleman inquired about some time ago, and he is representing the shipping control committee. He is already committed to this project of 30 feet as being a war necessity, as you will see from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of June 7, 1918.

Now, gentlemen, I am informed that a letter has been written by the Secretary of the Navy to my distinguished colleague [Mr. OLIVER], who will present that matter. This letter states in substance that it is very necessary from a naval standpoint that this harbor be opened rapidly at this time because of the fact that submarines are hiding and lurking along and near the Atlantic coast, and it might soon become necessary for our shipping to be transferred to the Gulf.

Ah, gentlemen, we ought not to quibble with this question of $140,000. Do you know this bill has been absolutely held up for days on account of an increased appropriation of that amount for this splendid port?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GRAY of Alabama. Yes, sir.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I am interested in what the gentleman says. I have no personal knowledge of the situation, but it occurs to me that all the letters that the gentleman cites do not answer the objection of the chairman of the committee, that even if that money was available it could not be spent.

Mr. GRAY of Alabama. I am glad the gentleman mentioned that. I went down a few days ago and had a personal interview with Col. Newcomer, the Army Engineer who has really had this matter in charge, and who sat with the committee and by it at nearly all the hearings. He stated that he had heard of some dredges that may be obtained from the Canal Zone, but it was probable that they might have to be used at other ports. Now, that was a mere speculation. He admitted the proposition that we might be able to get these dredges.

And, gentlemen, if we can get them, we ought to have the money to expend for this improvement. Now listen: If you do not appropriate the money and you can get the dredges, you can not have the work done, and you know it. If you appropriate the money, and you do not get the dredges, no harm is done at all. It is just simply appropriating $140,000 more, making the total $500,000, when originally $850,000 was recommended for this improvement. The chances are that we can get the dredges, and we are simply asking this House in all fairness to agree to this proposition as a war emergency, which the Government through different activities says is necessary. We are simply asking you to appropriate $140,000 more than was asked for by this committee.

Now, gentlemen, events have occurred in the last few months that Gen. Black seemingly does not know about, while he may be a man of learning and ability and technical knowledge. Some things have happened recently at Mobile and along the Gulf coast that he, perhaps, does not know anything about. Because of recent developments there are some things that our committee, when they were considering this proposition, did not know. The Government is preparing to utilize that great canalized river with 17 locks built into the coal fields of Alabama. A few days ago Judge Prouty openly stated that we should not even stop there. He believed that we ought to build another lock and go right into the heart of the best coal on earth. He says that after fair and deliberate consideration. The Government has determined to try out and to use the river. I mention this to show gentlemen here that practically every activity of the Government that has to do with shipping has emphasized the importance of deepening this channel, and doing it right now.

The idea of quibbling at a time like this; the idea of men getting up here and quibbling over $140,000 in a million dollar project when our country is at war! [Applause.]

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAY of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. If this appropriation fails, would the State of Alabama spend $140,000 to complete the project?

Mr. GRAY of Alabama. There is no law granting such a right.

Mr. WALSH. There is nothing to prevent them if they wanted to do it?

Mr. BURNETT. There is no authority to do it.

Mr. BENJAMIN L. FAIRCHILD. Of course, there is something to prevent it. The Constitution has something to say about it.

Mr. BURNETT. Under our Constitution it could not be done, anyhow.

Mr. GRAY of Alabama. I think the gentleman is correct about that. That is not a question to be considered. The plain, simple question before this House—and I present it to you as fair men—is whether or not you are going to quibble over $140,000 and hold up this measure longer. Why not say to Mr. SMALL and the other gentlemen who compose the conferees of this House—why not instruct them to go back and accept this amendment, and thus get this important measure behind us? It is nothing but right that this should be done. It does not establish a bad precedent.

Let me tell you something. Listen: Out of all the projects about which there was a controversy none remains to be settled in conference except as to this one project at Mobile.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. GRAY of Alabama. I would like to have unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The SPEAKER. The only way to do that is to ask to have the time extended, and you can have five minutes, and the Chair will consider that request as having been made.

Mr. SISSON. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, that the time of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL] be extended five minutes, so that his time shall be one hour and five minutes, and the extra five minutes shall go to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. GRAY].

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SMALL. I yield to the gentleman five minutes more.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will settle this question which three or four gentlemen have raised. It is true that a week or two ago, when we had a very angry debate, the Chair, without studying it, recognized the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] for an hour under circumstances like those now prevailing. The Chair made an error. The attention of the Chair had never been called to that particular state of affairs until that day. Nobody raised a point of order.

I will first read an opinion here that really is not very pertinent, but it throws a little light on the question. Then I will read one that is exactly in point. I quote from section 1459 of volume 2 of Hinds' Precedents:

A Member having obtained the floor to make a preferential motion may not thereupon demand the previous question to the exclusion of the Member in charge of the bill. On the calendar day of March 3, 1901, but the legislative day of March 1, the House was considering Senate amendments to the sundry civil appropriation bill, and a motion to recede and concur in the amendment making provisions for expositions at Buffalo, St. Louis, and Charleston had been decided in the negative.

Thereupon Mr. James S. Sherman, of New York, moved that the House recede and concur with a certain amendment, and on that motion demanded the previous question.

The Speaker, Mr. Henderson, said:

The Chair will state that he regards the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. Sherman] as in order; but he declines to entertain from the gentleman from New York a demand for the previous question, as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], who has charge of this bill, can not be taken from the floor in that way—

That is, about the previous question, which is the highest function that a gentleman can exercise about a bill or conference report.

Now, here is one exactly in point, by Speaker Carlisle, section 1460:

A Member may not, by offering a motion of higher privilege than the pending motion, deprive the member of the committee in charge of the bill of the floor. On February 28, 1889, the House was considering the Senate amendments to the District of Columbia appropriation bill. On the day before the gentleman in charge of the bill, Mr. Judson C. Clements, of Georgia, had moved that the House insist upon its disagreement to a certain amendment, and on that motion had demanded the previous question.

Thereupon Mr. Samuel Dibble, of South Carolina, made a motion to recede, and thereupon took the floor and claimed the right to debate for one hour.

The House having adjourned, when it met on the following day Mr. Samuel J. Randall, of Pennsylvania, made the point of order that the recognition of the gentleman from South Carolina would dispossess the gentleman from Georgia from the control of the bill, although there had been no adverse vote of the House so far as that control was concerned.

The Speaker, Mr. Carlisle, said:

The Chair thinks that it was undoubtedly correct to recognize the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. Dibble] for the purpose of making the motion to recede from the disagreement, notwithstanding the fact that the gentleman from Georgia had at the time pending a proposition insisting on the disagreement and had demanded the previous question. But the Chair, upon reflection, feels disposed to say that the gentleman from Georgia, under the practice heretofore prevailing in the House, was still entitled to the floor for the purpose of controlling the matter, having charge of the general subject, there having been no adverse action, and therefore the Chair thinks that the gentleman from South Carolina was not then entitled, under this usage, to recognition for the purpose of debate, but the Chair actually recognized the gentleman from South Carolina, and he yielded to the gentleman from Kentucky five minutes.

While the Chair thinks now this action was not strictly in accordance with the practice, the gentleman states that he will not occupy more time than would be allowed if the previous question was ordered, and the Chair will not undertake to reverse the action taken, but the Chair desires that the action taken yesterday shall not be a precedent.

There were three ex-Speakers mixed up in that squabble. While the parliamentary clerk was hunting up these decisions the Chair turned this thing over in his mind and came to the same conclusion before he found out that any of these Speakers had ever decided the question that way. Here is the situation: The gentleman in charge of the conference report has an hour. He makes a motion to insist. Then any gentleman has a right to make the preferential motion that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. GRAY] made, and he does not have to ask the consent of the gentleman in charge of the bill. He asks the consent of the Speaker. The Speaker recognizes him for one specific purpose, and that is to make his preferential motion. A good many gentlemen have been under the impression that if a man is recognized at all he is recognized for all purposes, which is not true. The late Hon. Augustus P. Gardner always insisted that there were two recognitions, and finally he convinced me of the truth of that; and that is the reason that the Chair asks a gentleman for what purpose he rises. There was a tremendous hullabaloo here once about the Speaker asking that question. When I became Speaker I started in with the intention not to propound that inquiry, and the first thing I knew I was in deep water and in a good deal of trouble.. After seeing how it worked out I concluded that Speaker CANNON had been right in demanding "For what purpose does the gentleman rise?" I have carried out that practice ever since. If the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. GRAY] in this case got possession of the floor in his own right for the purpose of debating, he would undoubtedly take the floor away from the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL] for the purpose of debating, because it is utterly impossible that two men should have the right to the floor at the same time. There are two ways of getting around it, whenever the House wants to do it. Of course, the House can do as it pleases at any time. The gentleman in charge of the conference report or somebody else may ask that the hour be extended. Of course, if it is extended, the extension of time goes to the gentleman in charge of the conference report. If that is not done and the House wants to debate the thing some more, the proper thing to do is to vote down the motion for the previous question. The Chair knows that some Members think they are bound all the time to vote for the previous question. They are no more bound to vote for that than they are to vote for anything else. So the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL] is in charge of the time, and yields five minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. GRAY].

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, if the Chair will permit me, in view of his exhaustive ruling——

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Should not the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL], in order to be entitled to the hour, have made some motion?

The SPEAKER. It was the fault of the Chair that he did not. The gentleman from North Carolina was going to make a motion to insist, and the Chair considered that as already made. Of course, he should have made that motion.

Mr. STAFFORD. The motion was not made, however, and to entitle him to the hour he should have made that motion.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman from North Carolina made a motion to agree to the conference report, and he was entitled to an hour on that.

Mr. STAFFORD. But that is out of the way.

The SPEAKER. That was disposed of.

Mr. LONGWORTH. But he had an hour to debate that.

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes; but the time under that hour is at an end when the conference report is adopted.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. GRAY] is recognized for five minutes, and the time of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL] is extended five minutes.

Mr. GRAY of Alabama. Gentlemen, something has been said here about establishing a precedent. You remember that several weeks ago we voted upon a measure here in this House that had not been recommended by the Board of Army Engineers. I refer to the Key West item. At that time we voted to put into the bill a certain appropriation, regardless of the engineers, because this House considered that it was a worthy project and the time had come when the money ought to be appropriated for it, and the House had a right to do it. I want to say to you gentlemen that if you are going to adopt the policy of letting the Army engineers say what every project shall be and then let them say just how much money shall be appropriated from year to year and just how much shall be spent, you might as well abandon the present policy and appropriate a lump sum and say to them, "Here is the money. Take it and spend it just as wisely as you know how." You might as well do that, because it is what you are doing here to-day if you fail to instruct or if the proposition for an increased appropriation of $140,000 is defeated. Now, the argument of the gentleman is that it will establish a bad precedent. I want to say to you again that this is the only proposition that has come up in this bill where the War Department has failed to recede and change from the original recommendations. I understand that the engineers receded and made certain recommendations on the Key West proposition after it got to the Senate; that they took it under consideration after the House had acted. You had said you wanted Key West in the bill. They, as stated, did finally recede and some kind of a recommendation was made by them while the matter was being considered in conference or at least after it had left the House.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. The Army engineers changed their opinion?

Mr. GRAY of Alabama. They changed their opinion, and they changed it after we had acted in the matter. I do not think this will be disputed by any Member of this House. So I say to you, gentlemen, here is a proposition that is a worthy one. Here is a project that the board of engineers say is a worthy one; here is a project that they say is a war emergency. I do not believe there is a man on the floor of the House who doubts it. Then why should you refuse to give the extra $140,000? I know what some gentlemen will say: "Well, you can't use it; you can't get the dredges." No man here can say that. The War Department engineers do not because they can not say it. All we are asking you to do is to give us $500,000 for this emergency proposition; and if we can not get the dredges, if we can not supply the means, we will not use the money. But, in all candor, I believe a way to have this work done will be found. It will be the duty of the engineers to find a way. It is the province and the duty of this House to say whether or not it will make the appropriation. [Applause.]

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OLIVER].

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I think it well that the position of the Army Engineers be restated in reference to the deeping of Mobile Channel to 30 feet. They have given their unqualified approval to this important measure and estimate the final cost of completion to be between $850,000 and $1,000,000. This bill carries the initial appropriation to deepen and widen the channel in accordance with the engineers' approval of this project. The very fact that the House committee inserted in this bill an appropriation for this purpose conclusively shows that the committee and Congress consider it an emergency measure, because it is understood that the House committee will now recommend only appropriations for emergency work. The only possible question, then, now at issue is whether dredges can be secured at this time to do more work than the $200,000, carried in the first draft of the bill, provides for.

Some days ago I submitted to the chairman of the Rivers and Harbors Committee a statement from a reliable gentleman that two dredging companies, on or about May 7, had given assurance that, within four or five months from that date, they would be able to do the dredging required at Mobile if it was considered an emergency measure. The names of these companies are the Southern Dredging Co. and the Gulf & Pacific Dredging Co., and my information is they will be prepared at such time to do this work if called on by the Government.

The question then recurs, Is the port of Mobile of sufficient importance at this time to warrant speeding up the work of deepening and broadening the channel there? I will call attention later to some facts, which clearly demonstate the absolute necessity of doing this work speedily. If it is a work which this House feels can be safely delayed, I would not insist on an additional appropriation. Another body, enjoying the same powers that we do and equally as interested in the public good, have thought that $140,000 additional could be wisely used at Mobile before another appropriation can be made. I think that they were right, and that the distinguished gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL] is entirely in error, and that the fear of the Army engineers that dredges can not be secured for the work is likewise without foundation.

I have personally talked with Col. Newcomer, who is the engineer really in charge of this work, and I know the gentleman from North Carolina has. Col. Newcomer will not undertake to say that dredges can not be procured, but simply that he is not now informed where they can be had. He recognizes fully the importance of this dredging, and certainly any additional money appropriated will be wisely used in deepening the channel or it will remain unexpended. Unless you appropriate now a sufficient amount to guarantee the continuance of work at Mobile until another appropriation bill passes the House, it will be difficult to secure from private companies dredges for this work. If, however, private companies can be shown that this work will be continued, and speedily pushed to final completion, I feel sufficient dredges can be provided for that purpose. This bill fixes a liberal allowance to private companies for work of this kind, and I am confident that, on the basis of Government cost as fixed in this bill, private companies can be found who will undertake this work.

The people of Mobile have always and still are showing their faith in the importance of that port by freely spending their own money in its development. The Railroad Director, the Fuel Administrator, the Shipping Board, and the Navy Department have all given letters showing interest in speeding up the work of deepening the channel at Mobile. The steel company is expending over $12,000,000 in the construction of a thoroughly up-to-date shipbuilding plant, capable of caring for ten 10,000-ton ships at one time. In addition to this large sum they are also expending many millions to extend and improve their plant at Fairfield, near Birmingham, Ala., so that they may speedily provide the materials for constructing ships at their plant in Mobile. This same company is building a city near Mobile to provide comfortable homes for their employees. The 10,000-ton ships which they will build can not be loaded to their deadweight capacity at Mobile unless the channel is deepened. Can it be possible that Congress would deny this additional appropriation now called for by the Senate amendment, in view of the absolute need of a deeper channel to enable the large vessels soon to be constructed at Mobile to fully load and carry important and ever-increasing cargoes to our Army and those of our allies? The expenditure of $12,000,000 in this shipbuilding plant is a certain guaranty of faith and interest in the importance of this harbor by its people.

The Shipping Board have authorized and contracted for the immediate construction of a 10,000-ton floating dry dock at Mobile. Why provide a dry dock of this size to be completed during December next unless you take immediate steps to deepen the channel so as to readily admit ships of heavy draft to come in and go out fully loaded? The Shipping Board has also authorized the immediate construction of a 2,500-ton floating marine railway for Mobile. I think the contracts for the dry dock and for the floating marine railway have been let since the House committee first acted on this bill.

The Railroad Director, in a few days, I think, will take over water transportation on the Warrior, a river canalized at an expenditure by the Government of more than $9,000,000. This river will thus carry to Mobile for export and other uses large quantities of bunker coal, cargo coal, lumber, steel, and iron.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Can the gentleman tell me what authority the Railroad Director has to take over water transportation?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Under the authority given by a bill passed by this Congress.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Oh, I disagree with the gentleman.

Mr. DEMPSEY. I suppose it is the same authority as that under which he took over the Erie Canal.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Exactly the same.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Which is no authority at all.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. The gentleman may not think so, but there are few, if any, who will agree with him in the opinion expressed. The Director has already exercised the authority conferred on him and will doubtless continue to wisely do so. I have simply alluded to this for the purpose of showing that Mobile Harbor is now and will continue to grow as an important distributing port for bunker and cargo coal, steel, and timber. On the banks of the Warrior River, available for shipment by water and within 200 miles of Mobile, more than 3,000,000 feet of lumber is being daily cut, and bunker and cargo coal are likewise found on this same river in inexhaustible quantities.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Our colleague from Alabama [Mr. GRAY] made some reference to a letter from the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Yes; I will refer to that in a few moments. There will soon be transported by river from the coal fields of Alabama more than half a million tons of bunker coal.

Mr. SISSON. Is that every day or every week or every month?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. That at present is the estimate for a year. This estimate will be rapidly increased when additional barges and boats for transporting it are added to the present river equipment. From mines now in operation near and adjacent to the river it is estimated four or five million tons a year can be shipped to Mobile by water if sufficient equipment is provided. New Orleans, Pensacola, and some of the ports on the Texas coast are dependent on the Alabama fields for their coal. There has recently arisen a large demand at the Gulf ports for cargo coal for Panama and the West Indies. The Fuel Administrator, in a letter submitted by my colleague [Mr. GRAY of Alabama], points out how heavy the demand will be for coal at the port of Mobile.

Many of the important ship companies, like the Leyland Line, are unable to send ships of heavy draft to Mobile, since the shallow channel of 27 feet prevents their being loaded to full capacity. On June 26 of this year the Nubian, a vessel owned by the Leyland Line, was at Mobile. She drew, when loaded, about 30 feet, and consequently could only be partially loaded at Mobile, and thus was forced to call at another port to complete her cargo. This is not of infrequent occurrence. Numerous instances have been cited to me where ships with 28 and 30 foot draft, loaded, were anxious to come to Mobile and were unable to do so because the 28-foot channel could not accommodate them.

If the appropriation added to this bill by the Senate is now approved by the House I am very hopeful that before the completion, in December, of the large dry dock ordered by the Shipping Board we will have deepened the channel sufficiently to accommodate many of the large steamers that are now knocking for admission to the port of Mobile. The Leyland Line, out of 44 ships, has only 11 at present that can load to full capacity at Mobile.

Mr. GRAY of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I will say to my colleague I am coming to the letter from Secretary Daniels in a moment. The activities of the Navy are intimately connected with the activities of the Fuel Administration, the Railroad Director, the Shipping Board, and Emergency Fleet Corporation. Letters have been submitted by my colleague [Mr. GRAY of Alabama] from these Government agencies urging the deepening of Mobile Channel, and this naturally led me to inquire about the matter from a naval viewpoint.

The appearance of submarines on the eastern coast, while not greatly alarming, yet at times may occasion some temporary cessation or lull in shipments from certain eastern ports, and since the Navy has shown such wise foresight in providing against every eventuality, I felt confident they had given heed and consideration to the question of using all ports, not only on the Atlantic coast, but also on the Gulf. Nothing could be more confusing to submarines that may occasionally be lurking off our coast than the knowledge that we are not dependent on any one, two, or three ports for exporting our cargoes abroad. Unquestionably every port on the Atlantic and on the Gulf, now provided with loading facilities and convenient for the assembling of food, munitions, and other war materials, should from a naval standpoint be speedily put in condition to accommodate both large and small ships. I was glad to find that the Navy is so keenly alive to the importance of this matter. Admiral Benson, chief of naval operations, recognizes fully the importance of Mobile Harbor as a distributing point, and the necessity of deepening the channel to the Gulf. The Secretary of the Navy, after consultation with Admiral Benson, who had given close study to this matter, wrote me this letter on the importance of deepening the channel at Mobile.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. CHARLES B. SMITH). The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Speaker, the discussion of the gentleman is interesting and instructive, and I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL] be extended for five minutes, and that such additional time be given to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OLIVER].

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. May I ask for time sufficient to read the letter from the Secretary of the Navy?

Mr. SMALL. I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman be extended one minute in order that he may have time.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be permitted to read the letter, whatever time it may take, without taking it out of the hour.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection? There was no objection.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, the following is the letter from the Secretary of the Navy:

THE SECRETARY OF THE NAVY,
Washington, June 27, 1918.

SIR: With reference to the operations in the Caribbean, it would be highly desirable from a naval point of view to make arrangements to deepen the water connection between the city of Mobile and the Gulf.

The appearance of enemy submarines along our eastern coast will necessitate the exercise of care in the transportation of coal to bunkering points in the West Indies, such as Kingston, and also probably to the Panama Canal. This coal could be routed through the Gulf and Caribbean waters and would be, therefore, safer than if transported through the Atlantic.

Furthermore, the very large number of vessels now under construction by the Shipping Board will be ready for the transportation of the over-sea Army and the cargoes for many of these vessels must necessarily be loaded in southern ports, one of which will probably be Mobile.

In addition, there are considerable quantities of steel manufactured in the Birmingham district for export abroad, and all of this material could be provided with easy shipment through this port.

The military situation is such that, therefore, I would recommend the deepening of the waterway from Mobile to the sea.

Sincerely, yours,

JOSEPHUS DANIELS.

Hon. WILLIAM B. OLIVER, M. C.,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

[Applause.]

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GALLAGHER], a member of the committee.

Mr. GALLAGHER. Mr. Speaker, no question has come before the Committee on Rivers and Harbors since I have been a member of it that has been given so much time for consideration as has this Mobile Harbor project.

Now, I want it to be understood that wherever a Member of this House has a project in his district, I am in favor of giving him all the consideration I can, and to help him get through his project if possible, and I am not bashful about saying so. I believe if a Member of this House has a project in his district that has been favorably recommended that he ought to be able to get an appropriation in our committee and from this House, but if the committee turns it down it is not fair for the Member to have that project brought out at the other end of this Capitol and tacked on a bill. [Applause.] Now, the gentleman representing the Mobile district will not hesitate to tell you that the Committee on Rivers and Harbors was exceptionally considerate in regard to this proposition on his account. We gave him every opportunity to try and convince the engineers that they should make these improvements that he desired, and they told us flatly that they could not do it, and it was on the strength of the statement of the engineers that we refused to make the appropriation that is now asked for. That is the exact situation. Now, he comes in here with a great bunch of letters to prove that this money ought to be appropriated; perhaps the most important letter in the bunch was from Mr. Hurley, of the Shipping Board. Well, he may know something about the building of ships, but I do not think he knows much about the harbors of the country, because in Mobile they have a sufficient depth of water for present purposes. I want to call attention to this fact, that of all the vessels in the over-sea business before the war not 10 per cent of them drew 27 feet of water, and they have 27 feet of water now in Mobile Harbor. Now, Mr. Hurley says that for the purpose of transporting coal, and so forth, that we ought to make these improvements. I do not think any of the boats he is building draw over 27 feet. Gen. Keller came before the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and told us that on the Black Warrior River, where we have spent upward of $10,000,000 on that river, which is really tributary to and part of Mobile Harbor, that little or no coal is being transported from the mines upon the Black Warrior River to Mobile, because the coal there is in such great demand at the mines that they would not ship it, and the other mines were so far distant from the Black Warrior River that it would not pay to haul the coal from the mines to the river and send it to Mobile Harbor in boats, and they have but few boats. Now, we are asked to put on this bill $150,000 additional because it was asked for at the other end of this Capitol.

I am willing to be as favorable to any Member of this House as I can when he has a project, but I do not believe it is good business for us to appropriate $150,000 for a project when the engineers and the Secretary of War say it is not necessary simply for the purpose of bolstering up the political fortunes of any individual. I do not believe it is good judgment, and we have the letters that you have listened to from the Secretary of War saying that they could not use the money, from the Chief of Engineers that says there are no dredges to do the work, that they can not make the improvements. Still, in the face of that testimony, men stand here and tell you that the engineers do not know what they are talking about, that there are improvements going on down there that engineers do not know anything about. Now, is not that the statement they make to you here? I am willing to help every Member of this House who has a project——

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GALLAGHER. I will.

Mr. HARDY. As the gentleman's only objection to this increase is that the money can not be spent, what hurt is there in appropriating it if it can not be spent?

Mr. GALLAGHER. What is the use of appropriating $150,000 when the Secretary of War says that he can not use the money?

Mr. HARDY. But they say that good and intelligent men think they can, and what harm is there in making the appropriation if it gives them a chance?

Mr. GALLAGHER. I think we ought to put a little reliance on the intelligence of the Secretary of War and the Chief of Engineers.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have one minute in order to answer a question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FORDNEY. Is it not good judgment at a time when we are at war with Germany and the people of this country are being taxed to their fullest limit for money that the Congress of the United States should judiciously spend the money that is collected from the people and not appropriate just simply because somebody says they would like to have it appropriated to help some man in Congress out in his district?

Mr. GALLAGHER. I think it is.

Mr. FORDNEY. In the extent of $150,000, and but few men in this House are worth $150,000 out of the people's pockets.

Mr. GALLAGHER. I think the best way I can answer the question of the gentleman from Michigan is to leave it to the intelligence of the House whether it is good business policy or not. [Applause.]

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Speaker, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN].

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GALLAGHER] has failed utterly to answer the able and convincing argument of my colleague, who represents the Mobile district. He has shown beyond all doubt and cavil that this is not only a meritorious project but an emergency war measure. Gentlemen, you can not afford to vote against his motion to concur in the Senate amendment when you consider the report of the Army engineers, the letter of the chairman of the Shipping Board, and the letter of the Secretary of the Navy.

The gentleman from Illinois is in error about this matter. The amount of produce going through Mobile Bay is by no means confined to that which comes down the Black Warrior River. Through this gateway to the coal and iron fields of Alabama passes the produce that comes to Mobile by railroad and by boat down the Alabama and Warrior Rivers.

Gentlemen, we are engaged in war with the arch enemy of mankind, and here is an agency at Mobile that can be made very useful to the whole country, and I trust that you gentlemen will support it. [Applause.]

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Speaker, at the end of four minutes, which I think I have remaining, I shall move the previous question. I desire, in conclusion, simply to make this supplemental statement. I had the honor of stating to the House when I was first on my feet that we had appropriated already in the sum of $360,000, all that was asked for and all that can be used for Mobile Harbor and bar during the fiscal year. That proposition has not been in the slightest degree controverted. Are gentlemen willing to assume the responsibility of appropriating money unnecessarily which can not be used? But, Mr. Speaker, the gentlemen who advocate this increased appropriation have read some letters from several officials outside the War Department who refer to the commerical importance of Mobile Harbor and who express the opinion that the channel should be deepened. They have sought the aid of some amiable gentlemen who had no jurisdiction and therefore no official responsibility. Among them was a distinguished citizen of my State, the Secretary of the Navy, who gave a letter to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OLIVER], who is a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs. There is no navy yard or base or other naval activity at Mobile. The War Department has exclusive jurisdiction of the improvements of rivers and harbors both for commercial and naval purposes. The Navy Department has no jurisdiction and can not know all the facts.

The Helm Commission made an investigation of Mobile as to its desirability for a naval base, and reported against it. I have before me testimony before the Committee on Appropriations of Gen. Goethals with reference to the Gulf ports for use in transporting over-sea products, and he uses these words:

> The Gulf ports have been eliminated on account of the additional time required to go there and back, the time lost being as much as seven days.

But Mobile has 27 feet, as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GALLAGHER] says. There is not 10 per cent of the ships engaged in our over-sea trade that have a loaded draft of more than 27 feet. I have before me here a communication from the Emergency Fleet Corporation, in which they state that they are not building a ship, nor have they given a contract for a ship which will have a loaded draft of more than 27 feet. And of all the ships they have commandeered only 12 per cent have a loaded draft of more than 27 feet. And I have a statement here of the great port of New York, which shows that for six months, from January 1 to July 1, 1914, just before the European war, of the ships that arrived and departed, only 12.4 per cent had a loaded draft of more than 27 feet. I have the figures here from Galveston, Tex., the great port on the Gulf, and of all the vessels that departed from that port for the year 1916 only 5 per cent went out with a loaded draft of more than 27 feet. So that Mobile, with its 27 feet, can accommodate, of all the ships engaged in the over-sea trade, all but about 10 per cent of them. And yet they bring letters from the Railroad Administration and from the Secretary of the Navy and attempt to use them as evidence to set aside the recommendations of the Secretary of War and the Chief of Engineers. I refrain from further comment.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended 10 minutes in order that we may have 10 minutes over here.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL] be extended 10 minutes, to be yielded to gentlemen on that side. Is there objection?

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, this will make about two-thirds of the time that the gentlemen have used against those who have favored this project.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland objects.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL] moves the previous question. The Chair wishes to state before he puts it that somehow, or somehow else, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL] never made a motion to insist. So the Chair will consider that as pending, and the motion for the previous question covers both that motion and the preferential motion of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. GRAY]. The question is on ordering the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. To ask just what the question is.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the preferential motion made by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. GRAY] to concur in Senate amendments 1 and 2, which are practically the same thing. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. GRAY].

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I demand a division.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] makes the point there is no quorum present, and evidently there is not. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll. The vote is on the motion to concur.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 111, nays 103, answered "present" 5, not voting 212, as follows:

To Mr. CRAMTON, indefinitely, on account of official business.

To Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania, indefinitely, on account of official business.

GOVERNMENT CONTROL OF TELEGRAPH AND TELEPHONE COMPANIES.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I present a privileged report (H. Rept. 743) from the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

House resolution 414.

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution the House shall resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of House joint resolution 309, "to insure the continuous operation of electrical communicating systems, to guard the secrecy of war dispatches, and prevent communications between public enemies"; that there shall be not to exceed two hours of general debate, one-half to be controlled by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] and one-half by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH.] At the conclusion of such general debate the resolution shall be considered for amendment under the five-minute rule. After the resolution shall have been perfected in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union the same shall be reported to the House with such recommendation as the committee may make, whereupon the previous question shall be considered as ordered upon the resolution and all amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution embodying the rule.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, it is possible that some gentlemen may want to consume a little time.

Mr. MADDEN. Does not that allow 40 minutes' debate—the previous question?

The SPEAKER. Yes; if somebody wants it. The gentleman from North Carolina is recognized for 20 minutes if he wants to debate it.

Mr. POU. So far as I am concerned, Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to debate this resolution. It speaks for itself, and I think that every Member of the House is sufficiently advised as to the necessity of the resolution to vote upon it without debate. I move the previous question.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Pennsylvania rise?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. To ask the gentleman if he will yield for a question?

Mr. POU. I will.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Has the Committee on Rules received any information from the President of the United States that this legislation is desirable?

Mr. POU. I will say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that I talked with Mr. Tumulty, the Secretary to the President, and asked him the direct question whether or not the President felt that it was essential that this resolution should be acted upon before the proposed recess commenced. After a conference with the President he called me over the phone.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Who? The President?

Mr. POU. No; Mr. Tumulty. I said that, after conferring with the President, Mr. Tumulty called me over the phone and stated that the President felt that it was very necessary that this resolution should be acted upon at as early a date as possible.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I wish to state to the gentleman that it has been reported in the papers—and I think some Members have given credence to the report—that the President himself was of the opinion that this legislation might well stand over until after the recess, knowing that if it were pressed at this time it would lead to delay; that is to say, it would occasion discussion in another body if it was not discussed much here, and that so far as the President himself was concerned there was no immediate intent to hasten the legislation in view of the large interests involved.

Mr. POU. I will say to the gentleman that the House is entitled to all information in that respect which I can give.

Mr. KITCHIN and myself were discussing the advisability of presenting this rule to-day, and he and I decided that it was desirable, in view of the fact that the recess had been so much talked about, to get direct information; and at his suggestion I went to the phone and in his name as well as my own submitted the inquiry whether the President deemed it necessary that this resolution should be acted upon before adjournment, and, as I stated, the answer came back in the affirmative.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. From Mr. Tumulty?

Mr. POU. From Mr. Tumulty, speaking after he had conferred with the President.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. May I ask the gentleman this: The taking over of the telegraph and telephone lines of the United States means the taking over of perhaps 50,000 employees into the Federal service. It involves the private rights of all parties concerned. It involves the question of the privacy of business messages and telegrams. It is a matter of momentous importance for the people of the United States. Does not the gentleman think that if the President of the United States desired this thing done he should at least tell Congress so in a message?

Mr. POU. I do not think that is necessary when the President has indicated his views with respect to the matter to various Members of the House, as I understand it, and also by letter to the chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Has the chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce a letter from the President of the United States advocating this legislation now?

Mr. SIMS. I certainly have.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That answers the question that I put to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU].

Mr. LONGWORTH. I did not understand from the gentleman's first statement that the President had affirmatively, definitely, answered the question as to whether it should be passed before recess but only that it was important and should be passed as speedily as possible.

Mr. POU. Before any recess was taken. I put that question to Mr. Tumulty: "Did the President deem this resolution important?"

Mr. SMALL. We can not hear the gentleman on this side.

Mr. POU. I said I submitted this question to Mr. Tumulty: "Whether the President deemed this resolution of such importance that it ought to be acted upon before the recess was taken?" That was to-day. He conferred with the President, came back, and called me over the phone and answered in the affirmative, speaking, as I understood, for the President.

Mr. LONGWORTH. That was not the statement the gentleman first made, and I wanted to understand the statement.

Mr. POU. It was the statement "the gentleman" intended to make, but probably did not make as clearly as he hoped he did.

Mr. GILLETT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. POU. Yes.

Mr. GILLETT. Can the gentleman tell us why it has become necessary that this should be passed before 30 days when no intimation of its need has been made until very recently?

Mr. POU. I can only answer the gentleman from what information he has, as well as I have. I imagine that conditions which have recently arisen emphasize the necessity of the legislation. That, however, is merely my own individual opinion.

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. POU. I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. SLOAN. Does the gentleman think that if this matter were delayed twenty-four hours we could receive a message from the President of the United States on this important subject, setting out the real necessity for it, and about which views of the President there would be no dispute, and the regularity of it, of course, would be recognized? It is a rather important matter. One might think that possibly there might be a message coming to Congress on this subject.

Mr. POU. As I stated a while ago, the gentleman from Tennessee (Mr. Sims), the chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, has a letter from the President which I understand gives the views of the President. I do not know how much in detail.

Mr. BARNHART. If the gentlemen will yield, why not take the short cut to it and have this letter read in the gentleman's own time?

Mr. POU. I am perfectly willing, and I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee to read the letter now if he desires to do so.

Mr. SIMS. Will the gentleman permit me to make a statement before I read it?

Mr. POU. I will.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, a resolution was introduced by the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ASWELL] on the 27th of June. It came to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce on the 28th, and in order to be sure that I understood the attitude of the administration I wrote four letters, one to the President, one to the Secretary of War, one to the Secretary of the Navy, and one to the Postmaster General, for the reason that I supposed the execution of that power, if it was given, would be through some one or more of these three Secretaries. The next morning I received letters from all of them, Mr. Burleson going into some detail, also a letter from Secretary Daniels, a letter from Secretary Baker, and a letter from the President, referring specifically to Mr. Burleson's letter, and favoring the resolution.

Mr. BARNHART. The gentleman ought to have that letter read.

Mr. SIMS. I will, but let me get through with my statement. I then called the committee together immediately, and the committee decided it was of such importance that we ought to have a hearing, and to have the said three members of the Cabinet called before the committee. The hearing was had and all three came and were interrogated at great length. There was absolutely no doubtful opinion expressed by any one of them, but it was stated emphatically by the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, and the Postmaster General that this power might be needed at any moment, and all they asked for was that the President be clothed with the power, so that he might exercise it if the emergency arose.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. In a moment. Then the committee went ahead and considered the resolution for a whole day and agreed to a complete substitute, even to the title, and it was reported by a unanimous vote of the committee, and now it is before you; a short resolution similar in all respects to the power conferred on him carried in the military bill with reference to the taking over of the railroads in 1916.

Mr. MADDEN. Did the committee think it worth while to invite the owners of these properties to come before the committee, so that they might find out what the owners thought about it, or did the committee think that the owners had any interest in the property?

Mr. SIMS. I have not the letters here with me. They are up in the committee room. When the resolution was passed empowering the President to take over the railroads in 1916, the owners of the railroads were not called before the Committee on Military Affairs, nor was a word said to them about that. If this resolution is passed and it becomes necessary to exercise the authority, as a matter of course, there will be supplemental legislation similar to that which followed the taking over of the railroads, but at this time there is a reason that may be a very potential reason. A great many Members seem to be of the opinion—they are not all of that mind—that we have necessarily got to take a recess.

Mr. MADDEN. I do not think so.

Mr. SIMS. That we have got to take a recess very soon, and it has been talked about so much that the legislative morale of the House is affected by it, and if a recess is taken this legislation ought to be passed, and it ought to be passed before to-morrow night.

Mr. BUTLER. There will not be a quorum here to-morrow morning.

Mr. SIMS. I am speaking so far as the House is concerned. This is our opportunity to get through with it this afternoon, and we are not responsible for what the other body does or does not do.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Can the gentleman state when this resolution was first introduced?

Mr. SIMS. A resolution similar to this, but not in all respects, was introduced in January by the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ASWELL]. On June 4 a resolution similar to the one introduced on June 27 was introduced and sent to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Was it introduced by the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ASWELL] on his own responsibility or on request?

Mr. SIMS. It was on his own responsibility, as I understand. He had introduced the first one on his own responsibility, but that resolution has not been reported and is not before the House. The resolution is now before the House, by way of a substitute, that removes every question and every doubt as to Government ownership, and continues the control only during the existence of the war.

Mr. MADDEN. I wish the gentleman would read the President's letter.

Mr. SIMS. It is in my committee room. I will send for it and put it into the RECORD.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, the minority members of the Committee on Rules did not oppose bringing this matter before the House at this time. There is a question, however, as to the wisdom of doing that thing. If, as has been stated in the press and rumored about the corridors of the Capitol, that the President was insisting on this legislation at this time, because a very grave emergency—a war emergency—made it necessary is true, no Member of this House would refuse to consider the subject and vote for the law giving the President the power to take over these utilities. But Government ownership of the telegraph and telephone is so apparent that it is at the back of the head of every Member of the House and almost every citizen of the country. The question of Government ownership of telegraph and telephones is not a new one. It has been discussed as an academic question for many years. The question is now made an emergency measure, because it is stated that the employees of the telegraph companies are about to go on a strike, and that to avert such a calamity it is necessary to take over these utilities.

Mr. Speaker, I do not believe the employees of the telegraph companies of the United States are about to go on a strike or that they will go on a strike and cripple these important utilities at this crucial time in our history. The patriotism of the people so employed is not below the level of the high average of the patriotism of all the people of the United States. I do not believe that it is necessary that this important step should be taken to avert the calamiity of a strike by the employees of the telegraph companies.

If, however, the President needs these utilities as a war measure and has given reasons therefor that have not been disclosed to the public, this measure should be considered by Congress and the law passed, but the question decided upon—the question of military necessity or an emergency that may now confront us is of a military nature. But if the effort is now made under the pretext of an emergency or a war measure to force Government ownership or control of these utilities at this hour in the session of this Congress it is most unwise to take it up and undertake to settle such an important question in a few hours.

The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] has said that Congress has lost its morale. I do not believe that; but it is true that Congress has been on the eve of a recess for the last three or four days, and it is now apparent that "There ain't going to be no recess," to use the vernacular of the street.

Mr. BUTLER. But do we not expect to pass this resolution this afternoon—put it through in two hours?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The whole thing depends on whether or not the President requests this as a war emergency. If it is true, as suggested, that the secrets of the Government have been getting into the hands of the enemies of the country, if it is true that anything has been wanting in the operation of these utilities by the present owners and managers that can be materially improved upon as a war measure by taking over the wires of the country by the Government, it ought to be considered in that light and the authority conferred by this bill given at once to the President.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I observe that the chairman of the committee has just come in bearing a voluminous document, which may throw some light on the question that the gentleman is talking about.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] will have time of his own, I have no doubt. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] and reserve the rest of my time.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama and Mr. GALLAGHER, by unanimous consent, were given leave to revise and extend their remarks in the RECORD on the Mobile Harbor amendments.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, under the Constitution of the United States the President of the United States is required to report to the Congress the state of the Union from time to time, and if this is not a case where the state of the Union is affected I do not know of such a case. It seems to me that if there is an emergency such as the gentleman from Tennessee indicates there is, the President could do no less than to send a message to the Congress indicating what the emergency is. I undertake to say that there is no emergency that calls for legislation on this subject at this time. I undertake to say that if legislation is to be enacted upon this subject, that it ought to be enacted with due deliberation. It ought not to be brought in here and passed under whip and spur on the demand of the chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and an insistence that it shall be enacted into law within an hour or two. It involves the investment of, I do not know how many billion dollars of private capital, and it seems to me that this private capital has some rights that even the Congress of the United States ought to respect. At all events the President of the United States has never objected to giving his views on war measures when he thought the time was propitious and the emergency sufficiently important. But we have no such statement from him on this occasion. We have simply a resolution introduced by the gentleman from Louisiana, referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, the chairman of which in his enthusiasm wrote four letters of inquiry immediately in connection therewith as to whether or not we should not as an emergency matter give it immediate consideration. He received in reply communications from four men, at least three of the four—the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, and the Postmaster General—are Government ownership men, who believe in such laws and who would take over private property for the purpose of bringing about Government ownership. What the attitude of the President on the question of Government ownership is I do not know, but I do know that even the President of the United States has no right to demand, through the chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, the enactment of legislation of this importance without communicating with the Congress itself. We have some rights and those rights should be respected. No man here will go further to uphold the hand of the President of the United States in his conduct of the war than I, and no man has gone further than I.

Mr. DOREMUS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes. I am not afraid to answer any question the gentleman wishes to ask.

Mr. DOREMUS. Will the gentleman inform the House whether in 1916, when we gave the President authority to take over the railroads, we did it in response to a special request from the President?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; we did it in response to a personal request. He said then, if I recall, that he ought to have the power to take over the railroads. He said that in a message to the Congress of the United States, read from the rostrum of the House. There can not be any question about that.

Mr. DOREMUS. The authority was conferred in 1916, in August, as a rider to the military appropriation bill. Does the gentleman mean to inform the House that that was done after the President had addressed a special message to Congress?

Mr. MADDEN. The President addressed a message to the Congress saying it might be necessary to take over the transportation facilities of the United States in order that he might be able successfully to conduct the war. Yes; I do say it. I reassert it, and nobody will deny it. The records will show.

Mr. DOREMUS. The gentleman is wrong about that.

Mr. MADDEN. No; I am not.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Did not the President issue a proclamation, and was not a bill prepared and sent here to the Congress urging the taking over of the railroads?

Mr. MADDEN. I have no objection now, if the President will send a message to Congress saying that the emergency exists, to doing anything that he wants, in order that he may be able, as Commander in Chief of the Army, to fully conduct the war; but I maintain, as a Member of the House, that there is no such emergency, and if perchance it may appear that the emergency may exist on account of a proposed strike, in God's name, is it to be the policy of the Government of the United States every time we have a strike anywhere that the Government must take over the property of the owners who are involved, in order that the Government itself will not be compelled to get into an embarrassed situation in the adjustment of the strike?

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS].

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, I was not free to oppose reporting this resolution from the Committee on Rules because of the manner in which it was submitted to the committee. If it had been a policy of Government ownership, I should have opposed it, for I am not in favor of Government ownership where the work can be carried on effectively by private ownership. I need not here and now enumerate my reasons for this position. If there is anyone back of a resolution like this in order that we may enlarge the field of Government ownership, I am not in sympathy with that. On the other hand, if the resolution comes before the House because we want to avoid a strike that is threatened, I have no sympathy with that, because I fully agree with what the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] just said, that it is not wise every time somebody makes a threat for the Government to surrender. I think that the most marked national humiliation that this House ever underwent was when we made the surrender on the Adamson bill which has been applauded in various parts of the country and by certain elements of our citizenship. I would vote, however, to give the President authority, in case the employer and the employee can not come together, to say that while he has no interest in the contention of either the employee or the employer for the sake of either, he is interested in the operation of the telegraph and the telephone for the sake of the public, and that if they can not come together, he will take them over and for the time being operate them for the Government. I would be willing to do that; but, Mr. Speaker, it was reported to us that the President wants this done in the interest of the efficiency of the war.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. How was that report made?

Mr FESS. It was made to the committee by the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS], after consultation that extended to the White House.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman refers to the statement made to the House a few moments ago?

Mr. FESS. A statement that went a little further in extenso, made to us in the committee room. I could not vote against the resolution upon the statement to the committee, for that was to the effect that the efficiency of the prosecution of the war was back of the suggestion. I voted to authorize the President to commandeer the shipyards. I voted for measures that are positively bewildering to me, involving an extension of executive authority that is appalling and which gives me cold chills when I think of it. But the President is Commander in Chief of the Army and the Navy, and we are in the most gigantic struggle the world ever knew, and every resource of this Nation must be utilized, and we will hold the President responsible for the utilization of every resource, and if he says to me that it is necessary to have the railroads under the direction of the Government, although I have always opposed Government ownership of railroads and Government operation of them, I shall defer to his judgment and vote to give him that authority, for the employment of which we will hold him responsible, and I think I can do no less in the matter of the telegraph and the telephone.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Of course, the gentleman will not go further than I on that. If the President says to the House that he wants any power that will enable him to successfully conduct the war, there is no man in the House who will not vote to give it to him.

Mr. FESS. I fully agree with my friend that there is a reason for complaint upon the part of the House that the statement has not been so specifically made to all Members, including members of the Committee on Rules, that makes it entirely clear.

Mr. LONGWORTH. That is the question I want to ask. I agree with the gentleman that if the President, as the Commander in Chief, asks for this power we ought to give it to him unanimously. But does the gentleman understand, as a member of the Rules Committee, that that power has been asked by the President as Commander in Chief?

Mr. FESS. I would answer my friend frankly——

Mr. BUTLER. Why does not the gentleman from Tennessee read the letter?

Mr. FESS (continuing). That is the understanding I have from the representation made to the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I wish to utilize those two minutes in requesting the gentleman from Tennessee to read the letter from the President of the United States urging Congress to pass this legislation at this session. I understand he did not have that letter a little while ago, but since then he has had time to get it.

Mr. SIMS. I will read the letter if I can have time to do it in.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I have two minutes, and I will allow the gentleman to use that time.

Mr. SIMS. That is not sufficient. When I read the President's letter I must also read another letter, to which it refers.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman knows the Congress of the United States is entitled to know whether the President approves of this legislation at this time.

Mr. SIMS. There is no question about that.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman from Tennessee has been very urgent in having this resolution passed. He knows as well as any man in this House that if the President has said it is necessary as a war measure that the House unquestionably will approve of the passage of the resolution, but if the matter is of so little importance that the gentleman from Tennessee can not get the letter of the President and will not read it to the House, the House ought to know that.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to read section 3 of the Constitution——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I did not yield to the gentleman to read section 3 or any other section. I am still upon my feet, within my own time, asking the gentleman from Tennessee to produce the letter which he says the President wrote him upon this subject. As the gentleman from Tennessee has not read that letter——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I now again call upon him to do so.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Tennessee be permitted at this time to read this letter, notwithstanding the time it will take.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Tennessee read the letter in controversy, notwithstanding the rule about 20 minutes to a side. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, as I said a few minutes ago——

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Read the letter!

Mr. SIMS. I was given unanimous consent to read, then?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has unanimous consent to read the letter, not to make a speech.

Mr. SIMS. I am not wanting to make a speech. There is plenty of time for that. The President, in his letter of June 28 to me, says:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, 28 June, 1918.

MY DEAR MR. SIMS: Thank you for consulting me about the enclosed. I endorse entirely the enclosed letter from the Postmaster General, which I herewith return, and think that the reasons are stated by him truly and comprehensively.

Cordially and sincerely, yours, WOODROW WILSON.

Hon. THETUS W. SIMS,
House of Representatives.

First I will read the letter which I wrote the President:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., June 28, 1918.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: I beg to call your attention to the inclosed House joint resolution, introduced by Mr. ASWELL, which resolution speaks for itself.

Will you kindly give me your opinion as to the desirability and advisability of immediate passage of this resolution. If you will kindly give me in detail your reasons for supporting the resolution, or for opposing it, if you are opposed to its passage, I shall be glad to have you do so.

Very truly, yours,

T. W. SIMS,
Chairman.

THE PRESIDENT,
White House.

The following is a letter from Mr. Burleson, so you will understand what the President's letter means, as it refers to Mr. Burleson's letter.

Mr. MADDEN. I knew that Mr. Burleson was in favor of it.

Mr. SIMS. The President referred to it and indorsed it.

OFFICE OF THE POSTMASTER GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., June 28, 1918.

Hon. THETUS W. SIMS,
Chairman Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: Answering your inquiry requesting my "opinion as to the desirability and advisability of the immediate passage" of the Aswell joint resolution (H. R. 309) giving the President power, "if in his discretion it is deemed desirable," to assume control of the communicating systems by electricity "in order to insure their continuous operation" during the occasion of war and "to guard the secrecy of military and governmental communications or to prevent communication by spies and other public enemies," I beg to say that such power and discretion to act seems imperative to safeguard public interests.

At this moment the paralysis of a large part of the system of electrical communication is threatened with possible consequences prejudicial to our military preparations and other public activities that might prove serious or disastrous. We are reminded that there is not a nation engaged in the war that intrusts its military or other communications to unofficial agencies.

I deem it, therefore, my duty not merely to approve but to urge the passage of the resolution, in order that the President may act, if necessary, to safeguard the interests of the country during the prosecution of the war.

Respectfully,

A. S. BURLESON,
Postmaster General.

Mr. MEEKER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SIMS. The letter of the Secretary of the Navy is as follows.

Mr. MEEKER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SIMS. Let me read the letter first. I have only been given time to read these letters.

Mr. MEEKER. Does this refer to the Aswell resolution?

Mr. SIMS. This is the Aswell resolution reported by substitute. This is from the Secretary of the Navy:

THE SECRETARY OF THE NAVY,
Washington, June 27, 1918.

Hon. THETUS W. SIMS, M. C.,
Chairman Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: I have received your letter of June 28 asking my opinion as to the desirability and advisability of the immediate passage of House joint resolution No. 309 "to insure the continuous operation of electrical communicating systems, to guard the secrecy of war dispatches, and prevent communications between public enemies." I believe that such resolution is of high military importance and that during this period of war the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy ought to have the power to take possession and control of any telegraph, telephone, marine cable, or radio systems and operate the same subject to those conditions of law, so far as applicable, which are in force as to steam railroads while under Federal control.

It was found absolutely necessary early in the war to take control of radio systems, and I think it is almost as important that the President should have the power to control all methods of communication.

Sincerely, yours,

JOSEPHUS DANIELS.

This is a letter from Mr. Baker, Secretary of War, written July 1, as he was not here when my letter was sent:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, July 1, 1918.

DEAR MR. SIMS: I thought it both expedient and wise that the President should have conferred upon him the powers which he is given under the provisions of House joint resolution No. 309.

Cordially, yours,

NEWTON D. BAKER,
Secretary of War.

Hon. THETUS W. SIMS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

These are the letters, and after that the three Secretaries were before the committee and were examined at great length for a whole day.

Mr. GILLETT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. GILLETT. I understand these letters were written in response to the letters which the gentleman wrote them?

Mr. SIMS. Yes; they were.

Mr. GILLETT. I understand a similar resolution was introduced by the same gentleman some months ago?

Mr. SIMS. No; the resolution introduced by Mr. ASWELL in January was not a war-time proposition.

Mr. GILLETT. It was to take over these utilities?

Mr. SIMS. It was not confined to the operation of the war, and therefore never considered by the committee.

Mr. GILLETT. Well, I wondered why the gentleman did not write to these secretaries then just as well as now?

Mr. SIMS. I will tell the gentleman. There was much talk of an early recess, and I knew there was but little time in which to act on the resolution.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, I thought that unanimous consent was only given to read the letter.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM] demands the regular order, and that is to confine this to the reading of these letters.

Mr. SIMS. They have been read.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I have some time left, I believe.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has three minutes remaining.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SLOAN].

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Speaker, in regard to this round-robin correspondence which has just been read, a key to which would be a valuable asset of the House, I desire to read section 3, which was smiled at a little while ago. It is from a document by some considered obsolete, but for which I have still a good deal of respect. Section 3 of Article II of the Constitution of the United States reads as follows:

He shall from time to time—

Referring to the President—

give to the Congress information of the state of the Union and recommend to their consideration such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient.

It is mandatory on the President, as I understand, where there is a measure judged necessary, especially a war measure, or expedient, that he confer with Congress and not with an isolated individual, even though he be chairman of a committee; that he shall communicate in the usual method to Congress by formal message stating what he deems necessary or expedient legislation. If he does not so communicate to Congress, the legislation ought to be understood as ordinary legislation originating in the House and considered in the House absolutely independent of the wish or the thought or the judgment of any branch of this Government except what is represented in this House. A war measure should at least deserve an ordinary message from the President, so that the Members may know whether it is a real war measure. Thus far no man can tell whether it is or not. If in the debate it appears even strongly probable that it is a war measure, I shall vote for the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] has one minute remaining.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN].

Mr. MADDEN. During that one minute, Mr. Speaker, I will undertake to say that there is not a word in either of the four letters read by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] indicating that there is any emergency existing requiring the immediate passage of the legislation. The gentleman from Tennessee in his anxiety for legislation, in order that he might be able to come to the floor of the House as chairman of the committee and report a great bill, writes to the President of the United States and asks him whether there is any reason why this report should not be considered now, and the President says that he agrees with the language expressed by the Postmaster General, who has written him a letter on some other topic, in which he includes the possibility of taking over the telegraph and telephone. Everybody knows the Postmaster General is a "bug" on Government ownership, and that he has tried to take over the Alaskan telegraph and telephone systems and wanted to buy the Hawaiian telegraph and telephone systems and wanted to buy the cable system between Hawaii and Alaska; and the Post Office Committee after consideration turned down the foolish proposition.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired. All time has expired. The question is on agreeing to the rule.

The question was taken and the rule was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the House joint resolution 309, with Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 309) to insure the continuous operation of electrical communicating systems, to guard the secrecy of war dispatches, and prevent communications between public enemies.

Resolved, etc., That the President, if in his discretion it is deemed desirable, in order to insure their continuous operation, or to guard the secrecy of military and governmental communications, or to prevent communication by spies and other public enemies thereon, or for other military or public reasons, shall have power to take possession and control of any telegraph, telephone, marine cable, or radio systems, and operate the same subject to those conditions of law, so far as applicable, which are in force as to steam railroads while under Federal control.

Also the following committee amendment was read:

Committee amendment: Strike out all after the enacting clause down to and including the word "control," in line 4, page 2, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That the President in time of war is authorized and empowered to supervise or to take possession and assume control of any telegraph, telephone, marine cable, or radio system or systems, or any part thereof, and to operate the same in such manner as may be needful or desirable for the duration of the war, which supervision, possession, control, or operation shall not extend beyond the date of the proclamation by the President of the exchange of ratifications of the treaty of peace: Provided, That just compensation shall be made for such supervision, possession, control, or operation."

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ASWELL].

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, the day we entered this war I believed earnestly that the Government should promptly take charge during the war of all its means of electrical communication. I discussed it many times with leaders of the administration and with gentlemen of both branches of the Congress. I believed the wires should be taken over with the railroads. On January 4 last I introduced House joint resolution No. 206, looking to this end. A short time ago the situation seemed not only more serious, but growing desperate. After consulting the President and others I revised my original resolution and introduced the one made the basis of the pending committee report. The exigency is too great, the crisis too grave, to quibble over the form of the language or the pride of authorship. The amended resolution does not go as far as I would like, but it gives the authority sought, and I am for it exactly as it came from the committee, my only thought and purpose being to give the President needed authority now.

The fear of permanent Government ownership resulting from this legislation to meet the acute military crisis is ill founded. Those who oppose Government ownership must be insincere or selfish if they are afraid to have it tried out. Those who favor Government ownership should be equally glad to have a trial, but permanent Government ownership is not involved. By reading my original resolution or the later one now pending any man whose grade of intelligence ranks above the "chinquapin caliber" will readily observe that permanent Government ownership was not intended to be involved and is not now involved. It is easy to speculate on what may happen, but speculation is not here involved.

Mr. Chairman, regardless of its policy in time of peace, no nation at war in the world except the United States has neglected to safeguard and protect its interests by controlling and operating its means of electrical communication. When a country is at war its electrical wire system is its mouthpiece; its tongue of fire; its strong right arm that gives power and victory. Why should we continue to let that mighty arm of our Government lie limp and withered in time of war because of inadequacy or inefficiency? Not to act now is inexcusable and indefensible, if not disloyal.

In France, in England, in Germany alike the government occupies exclusively the great central electrical exchange offices where no private agency dares to enter and where sworn and trusted government officials have first hand, constant, and intimate touch with every detail of the situation. In an instant they can reach with masterful efficiency any activity or agency in the country, including those at the battle fronts. The government literally has its fingers on every detail. In European countries they do not have to intrust official business or war secrets to doubtful private agencies; nor do they find it necessary because the telegraph wires are overtaxed to permit the sending of important government telegrams by railroad train in handbags or suitcases, which inefficiency in this country has recently brought a blush of shame to every American patriot.

If the telegraph wires are inadequate, the telephone systems have plenty of wires over which telephone and telegraph messages may be sent alternately or simultaneously. The country now needs to utilize every resource. Every existing wire should serve the country at full capacity in time of war. Mr. Theodore N. Vail, president of the American Telephone & Telegraph Co., in his annual report of 1911, presents the following illuminating facts: First, a telephone trunk line of 40 wires, being one of a number of such trunk lines joining two large metropolitan areas 250 miles apart and serving intermediate cities, towns, and rural districts, when used for the telephone exclusively, furnishes 30 telephone circuits reaching 700,000 telephone stations; second, a telegraph trunk line of 40 miles of the same length and under same conditions, when used for telegraph exclusively, gives 80 telegraph circuits reaching 300 stations at which telegraph messages may be sent and received; third, these same two trunk lines worked in cooperation so as to provide both telephone and telegraph service upon each simultaneously give a total of 160 through telegraph circuits, a gain of 80, and a total of 60 through telephone circuits, a gain of 30, over the combined facilities of the two lines when one is used only for the telephone and the other only for the telegraph. The number of stations where telegrams may be received and sent is increased from 300 to 700,000.

Mr. Vail states:

To have uniformity and cooperation there must be common interest under common control, either through ownership of property, ownership of controlling interest, combination, or agreement; whichever way it is, it must be sufficiently strong to constitute practically one system, intercommunicating, interdependent, universal.

The existing wire mileage of the present telephone toll circuits and telegraph plants brought up to standard construction, with some provision for deficiencies or extensions, if "composited" or used jointly, would for all practical purposes be the equivalent of two plants each of the same mileage, one for telephone and one for telegraph; or, to put it another way, the wire mileage necessary to give the same service need be about half the combined wire mileage of the two systems separately operated as now.

The annual gross revenue from either a telephone or a telegraph system would be approximately 33 per cent of the total cost of or the investment in plant. If in two systems of equal size one plant were eliminated and both services were performed over the other, the percentage of joint revenue to plant would be substantially doubled, or 65 per cent. To put it another way, the maintenance of a wire plant costs about 30 per cent of the annual gross revenue from that plant. The simultaneous use of a plant for both purposes would mean maintenance of one wire system against the double revenue from both services, or a decrease in maintenance alone of about 15 per cent of the gross revenue. In addition to these savings, there would be the savings of the capital charges and of taxes on plant which would be made unnecessary. This brings within the realm of possibility a reduction of from 20 per cent to 25 per cent in the gross charges or gross revenue without affecting the profits of the business.

In order to avoid confusion it must be distinctly borne in mind that the telephone service referred to here is the toll, or long-distance service, and not the circuits of the exchange service, which could not be used for any other purpose. The toll, or long-distance service, is so intimately interwoven and interdependent both in operation and use with the telephone-exchange service that it could not be separated, but the operation of the toll circuits in connection with the exchange circuits would not interfere with their use for telegraph purposes by a regularly organized telegraph staff.

These are the possibilities, fraught with all sorts of advantage to the public.

There are in the United States, including about 50,000 miles of independent toll pole lines, altogether 225,000 miles of telephone pole lines, and 2,500,000 miles of toll telephone wire, not including the exchange service wires, which can be composited with telegraph wires to carry telegrams. There are 202,000 miles of Western Union pole lines with 1,442,000 miles of wire; 67,000 miles of Postal Telegraph pole lines with about 500,000 miles of wire.

The valuation of all wire lines is about $1,500,000,000, of which the telegraph wires represent less than $200,000,000.

The Bell (telephone) system's net outstanding capitalization is about $918,000,000, the efficiency of which working capital, if the telephone lines were composited with the telegraph lines, would be doubled in the interest of the public and the market value of the stock, according to Mr. Vail, would be increased by 25 per cent.

The Bell's gross receipts last year were	$302,000,000
The Bell's net receipts last year were	72,000,000
The gross receipts of the telegraph companies, including cables, were	98,000,000
The net receipt of telegraph companies, including cables, about	20,000,000
Net receipts of independent companies, not known, but estimated at	25,000,000

So, it is observed that these wire systems, all together, are now earning annually, net, not less than $117,000,000.

Moreover, the three systems (the Bell, the Western Union and the Postal) triplicate one another and thus lose greatly in value and efficiency. When combined or composited for simultaneous telegraph and telephone purposes the capacity of the wires of the three systems will each be increased by 100 per cent.

The present pressing military necessity makes the immediate passage of this resolution urgent and compelling, while the economic facts show that its passage, if put into action, will increase the money value of the wires and give better service to the public. [Applause.]

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH] now use some of his time?

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I am for this resolution, and one thing which has induced me to support it is the fact that it was initiated by a Member of the House and did not come here inspired by any administrative agency of the Government. I have heard on this floor on more than one occasion criticisms, and more particularly coming from this side, to the effect that legislation nowadays is all inspired and framed in the departments, handed to the Congress, and ratified by it, without any action on the part of Congress in the initiation. It is therefore with a feeling of satisfaction that I greeted this resolution, which was not initiated in the departments, but came from a Member of this House. Our committee gave it due consideration and judged it by its merits irrespective of whether it had administration indorsement or not. I think we would come to a sorry pass in this House if we judged measures merely by the strength of the Government indorsement and not by the strength and the merit which a resolution or a bill itself contained. We considered the proposition. We felt as a war necessity that we should give this power to the Chief Executive. We made a careful investigation of the statutes and of the decisions of the courts, and came to the conclusion that there was no existing statue which gave to the President the power to take over, to possess, or to operate any of these lines of communication. And fearing that during this crisis an emergency might arise we wished to safeguard the hands of the President and the administration and give him the power which this resolution gives.

I trust the gentlemen of this House will read its language carefully. We give him during the war the right to supervise, to take possession of, to control, or to operate. That would mean that the President, in his discretion, if he saw fit, would not have to take physical possession of any of these lines of communication, but he could merely content himself with supervision, as before the declaration of war he took over the supervision of wireless-telegraph stations along the Atlantic coast.

This is a vast subject for consideration. There ought to be, no doubt, more time for its consideration, but the emergency still exists, and the Secretary of War said in his testimony before us that this immediate moment may not indicate the emergency but the next minute might. That is a reason why our committee felt constrained to give favorable consideration to this resolution at this time.

As it originally came before us there was no limitation. We insisted that it should be for the duration of the war and until the proclamation of the treaty of peace made by the President. This deprives it of the charge of a Government-ownership proposition, for at the end of the period of the proclamation of peace it will be for Congress to determine its subsequent status. We put in, in order to make it constitutional in the opinion of some of us, a provision for just compensation. I will supplement that with an amendment which I propose to offer, that will clarify that situation, and I trust will be accepted by the House.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Will the gentleman submit to the House what the amendment is?

Mr. ESCH. I shall offer the language which is contained in the urgent deficiency act approved June 15, 1917, where we gave the President the power of taking over shipyards and ships and plant equipment, and so forth, adding these words—and let me read the last sentence, so that you will get the context. The resolution is as follows:

Provided, That just compensation shall be made for such supervision, control, or operation—

to be determined by the President; and if the amount thereof, so determined by the President, is unsatisfactory to the person entitled to receive the same, such person shall be paid 75 per cent of the amount so determined by the President and shall be entitled to sue the United States to recover such further sum as, added to said 75 per cent, will make up such amount as will be just compensation therefor, in the manner provided for by section 24, paragraph 20, and section 145 of the Judicial Code.

That has stood the test of both Houses and is now the law. Under its operations over $400,000,000 or $500,000,000 of ships and shipyards and contracts have been taken over, and not one contest, as I am informed, has gone to the courts.

It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, we ought to put that sort of a provision in here in order that the small independent lines might know their status now, and in order that we may not put them in the same precarious position as the short-line railroad companies have been put. Under the Federal-control act we have not yet entered into contracts with trunk lines, notwithstanding that act was passed on the 21st of March, 1918. We do not put the 8,000 telephone companies of the United States, operating 15,000 exchanges, in such a position as that.

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ESCH. Yes.

Mr. MEEKER. As to the policy adopted by the administration of handing back the small railroads, the short lines, is it the judgment of the gentleman to take all the telephones—all the small plants and little telephone lines—scattered over the country?

Mr. ESCH. The language of the resolution is "in the discretion of the President." If he thinks they are necessary in a war emergency he shall take them. It is difficult, if not impossible, to circumscribe in this respect the discretion of the Chief Executive, but I think, if the gentleman will allow me, that this amendment which I suggest will remove any doubt as to the condition and the financial status of the small independent telephone lines, and by its terms we will not jeopardize them, as the short-line railroads have been jeopardized under the Federal railroad act—not from the fault of Congress, because I think we expressed our intent clearly enough, but as the result of interpretation.

Mr. SISSON. If I caught the gentleman's amendment——

Mr. ESCH. It came from the gentleman's own committee and was incorporated in the deficiency act.

Mr. SISSON. Does the gentleman think his amendment is sufficiently broad to cover the small so-called independent telephone companies?

Mr. ESCH. Yes; and unless that is put in your short telephone lines would not have any right to go to the Court of Claims. We give them here a status, and we protect them, and they ought to be protected.

Mr. Chairman, I wish to reserve the balance of my time, because I have large demands. [Applause.]

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, how much time has the gentleman used?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has used nine minutes.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DEWALT].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. DEWALT. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, had this measure been proposed to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce clearly and succinctly as a measure for Government control and ownership of telegraph and telephone lines, I should have been opposed to it. My opposition would not only have been continued in the committee itself, but all the efforts of my mind would have continued on the floor of the House against any such unwise and, as I deemed it, almost revolutionary process. It may be that I am wrong. I very frequently am. But I believe that I am right in asserting that we have proceeded along the line of Government control, supervision, and almost ownership of public utilities to the extremity, and we have done it under the guise of what we call war necessity.

I therefore deemed it to be my duty in the committee to voice my opposition against any measure of this sort unless it clearly expressed the intention of the legislature that it was only a war measure, and should be in existence only during the period of the war.

That was one of the matters in dispute before the committee, and I am revealing no confidence when I make that statement. It was then determined that the Aswell resolution should be reframed and re-formed in such manner as we now have the Sanders resolution, namely, that it should clearly and definitely state, beyond the peradventure of a doubt, that this resolution and this power conferred upon the President of the United States was for the duration of the war and for no longer period, thereby clearly making it a war measure.

The next doubt that arose in the minds of some of the members of the committee was this: For what length of time shall this power be exercised? Shall it cease immediately upon the termination of the war, or shall it, as we provided in the railroad act, continue the power for, perhaps, 6 months, or, as in that instance, for 21 months, after the declaration of peace? There were certain gentlemen in the committee, well founded in their belief, who believed that these "scrambled eggs," as they called them, could not be "unscrambled" unless there was a definite period of time granted. Some of the gentlemen thought 12 months; others, again, suggested 6 months; and, I believe, there was a suggestion of 3 months. Others, again, thought that in order to make the matter clearly a war measure, and in order to limit the power of the Executive beyond the shadow of a doubt, we should say definitely and determinately that the power over these great utilities should cease—when? Immediately on the declaration of peace and the affirmation of the proclamation thereof. Therefore that dispute was settled as against any continuation of power beyond that definite time.

Now, the third matter that engaged the attention of the committee was this question of compensation. The Aswell resolution provided that all laws or parts of laws in reference to taking over railroads that were applicable to this situation should be applied to the taking over of these telegraph and telephone lines.

In my judgment that was very inapt, and at the same time very inartistic phrasing, to say that all parts of a law applicable to this situation should be applied to the situation because it had been applied to a previously existing condition. Therefore I disagreed with that, and it was finally determined that some provision in regard to compensation should be placed in the act, but that no form or process definitely determined should be placed in the act, and that that should be left to future legislation by Congress, for the reason that this contemplates only the taking over and does not accomplish the taking over. In other words, it gives the power to take over but does not actually at the same time make present the condition of taking over.

In the committee the point was raised, and I was one of those who raised it as a lawyer, that no legislative enactment of this kind would be valid and constitutional unless the act itself provided, in the body thereof, that there must be some means definitely set forth in the act for the determination of compensation. I was very sincere in that. I argued the question at considerable length, possibly much to the weariness of some of the gentlemen on the committee. A great number of citations were given to the committee, and by a very close vote, in fact by a divided vote—and again I am not violating the confidence of the committee—finally this clause was put in as a compromise:

Provided, That just compensation shall be made for such supervision, possession, control, or operation.

The amendment that was suggested in the committee was that the compensation should be determined by arbitration if possible, by agreement if possible; but if not possible by either one of these two means, that the parties should respectively submit their claims to the Court of Claims of the United States. That was the amendment suggested by a member of the committee, and this finally was adopted in place thereof. I say now that no man is more willing to retreat from a position which he has once taken if he discovers that he is wrong than I am, and I am frank to say that although I gave the matter careful investigation I am now convinced that there is no necessity for putting in any provision as to compensation. I believe that it would perhaps be the course of wisdom so to do. My colleague upon the committee [Mr. ESCH] has proposed an amendment. I believe that it would be wise to incorporate such a provision. I believe it would have been wise to incorporate the provision that I suggested in the committee; but I assert now that under the decisions as I have found them there is absolutely no necessity for either process. Now, why do I say so? If my colleague [Mr. ESCH] will examine the Judicial Code on page 86, he will find that the Court of Claims has this jurisdiction—I read from section 145:

All claims (except for pensions) founded upon the Constitution of the United States or any law of Congress upon any regulation of an executive department, upon any contract, express or implied, with the Government of the United States, or for damages, liquidated or unliquidated, in cases not sounding in tort, in respect of which claims the party would be entitled to redress against the United States either in a court of law, equity, or admiralty if the United States were suable.

Now, that being the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims, one of the provisions thereof says a claim founded upon the Constitution of the United States. Certainly this claim is founded upon the Constitution of the United States, because the Constitution expressly says that no property shall be taken for public purposes without just compensation. Second, a claim founded upon an act of Congress. We have here a resolution of Congress providing for the taking over of private property for public use. So that if this property is taken over, it four-squares with both these provisions, to wit, that it is founded upon the Constitution of the United States, which provides that just compensation shall be made for property taken, and, second, it is founded upon an act or resolution of Congress.

Third, upon any contract, express or implied, with the Government of the United States, for damages in cases not sounding in tort, in respect of which claims the party would be entitled to redress against the United States either in a court of law, equity, or admiralty if the United States were suitable.

It follows as clear reasoning that when the United States takes the property of another party against the will of that party, if you please, or even with the consent of that party, or if it exercises, as in this case, that which is tantamount to the right of eminent domain, there follows clearly and inevitably this conclusion, that there is an implied contract that the United States will pay. Why? Because when you take from another that which belongs to him and use the same, even with his consent, there is an implied contract upon your part, if you enjoy the fruits thereof, that you will compensate the owner for such use or such taking.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. In that event, the right of compensation would follow?

Mr. DEWALT. The right of compensation would have to be determined by the facts as submitted to the Court of Claims. Now, am I right in that? So many of the membership of this committee are lawyers that I know you will be interested in this matter——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield at this point?

Mr. DEWALT. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The rule that the gentleman has explained applies in time of war and under the necessity of war in taking over property, just the same as it would in time of peace?

Mr. DEWALT. Yes. I take the basic position, my friends, that the exercise of this power even at this time by the President of the United States without legislation is very, very doubtful. I take that position, not as a constitutional lawyer, because that seems to be a pet phrase of a great many of us, but as a lawyer who has read the decisions. I am very doubtful whether the President would have the right to take over this property unless he was so authorized by a specific act or resolution. But be that as it may, we now have the resolution before us empowering him so to do; and that being a resolution of Congress, and the Constitution proclaiming that a man must be compensated for the taking of his private property, there is no question in my mind that the remedy is here by which people can obtain restitution and damages for the taking. Therefore it is unnecessary to include it in the act itself. Am I right in that? In the United States v. Great Falls Manufacturing Co., One hundred and twelfth United States, at page 656, the court in its opinion said:

It seems clear that these property rights have been held and used by the agents of the United States under the sanction of legislative enactments by Congress, for the appropriation of money specifically for the construction of the dam from the Maryland shore to Conns Island was, all the circumstances considered, equivalent to an express direction by the legislative and executive branches of the Government to its officers to take this particular property for the public objects contemplated by the scheme for supplying the Capital of the Nation with wholesome water. The making of the improvements necessarily involves the taking of the property; and if, for the want of formal proceedings for its condemnation to public use, the claimant was entitled at the beginning of the work to have the agents of the Government enjoined from prosecuting it until provision was made for securing in some way payment of the compensation required by the Constitution—upon which question we express no opinion—there is no sound reason why the claimant might not waive that right, and, electing to regard the action of the Government as a taking under its sovereign right of eminent domain, demand just compensation. (Kohl v. United States, 91 U. S., 367, 374.) In that view we are of opinion that the United States having by its agents, proceeding under the authority of an act of Congress, taken the property of the claimant for public use, are under an obligation, imposed by the Constitution, to make compensation. The law will imply a promise to make the required compensation where property to which the Government asserts no title is taken, pursuant to an act of Congress, as private property to be applied for public uses.

Such an implication being consistent with the constitutional duty of the Government, as well as with common justice, the claimant's cause of action is one that arises out of implied contract within the meaning of the statute which confers jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims of actions founded "upon any contract, express or implied, with the Government of the United States."

And in this taking over of the property of the Great Falls Manufacturing Co. there was nothing except the passage of the appropriation bill for the expenditure of money looking toward an improvement.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEWALT. I will.

Mr. DEMPSEY. With the resolution as it is you are going to be in this position: That the whole question of compensation will be open for proof, whereas if you had adequate or proper language provided, as we did in the railroad bill, you would narrow it to specific proof to make compensation in accordance with that proof.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ESCH. I yield to the gentleman one minute more.

Mr. DEWALT. In answer to the gentleman's question, I thoroughly agree with the basic idea, and I agree with my colleague from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH] what I was insisting upon in committee, that we should provide for such a remedy definitely stated; but I still maintain, after reading the decisions, that it is absolutely unnecessary.

Now, in the case of Knote against United States, reported in Ninety-fifth United States, the Supreme Court, says:

There is another view of this case, which must lead to an affirmance of the judgment of the Court of Claims. The jurisdiction of that court is limited to claims founded upon a law of Congress, or upon a regulation of an executive department, or upon a contract, express or implied, with the Government. The claim here presented rests upon a supposed implied contract to pay to the claimant the money received as the proceeds of the forfeited property.

And therefore the claim is sustained. With that argument in regard to compensation in the bill, I leave it to you to determine whether when the amendment is proposed by my colleague, the gentleman from Wisconsin, we deem it expedient to incorporate it or not. Personally, I will support an amendment or that kind if phrased in accordance with the gentleman's views. [Applause.]

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DECKER] 10 minutes.

Mr. DECKER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, most of our debate in the committee was on the question as to whether or not it was necessary, in order to make the bill constitutional, to provide for a method or means of ascertaining what was a just compensation for taking the telegraph and telephone lines. The time was so short that we did not have time to settle that legal proposition, but I want to compliment the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DEWALT] in getting the authorities which do settle it. That question being settled as to its not being necessary to make this provision in the resolution at this time, I desire to address myself most earnestly to the proposition that if the resolution is to be passed in the House this afternoon, that nothing be put in the bill fixing the methods of ascertaining what is a just compensation, and I hope I may have the attention of the committee for just a minute on that.

My reason for that contention is this: I do not think there is a man in this House that has given sufficient consideration to the question—and with no disrespect to the intelligence of the Members of this House—I do not believe you can make up a fair decision as to what is the best way to ascertain a just compensation for taking over the great property at this time and doing it in two hours.

I most seriously and earnestly object to the amendment which will be offered by the distinguished and able gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH]. I am not prepared to say that his method of ascertaining what is a just compensation is not right, but I do doubt his ability, and I doubt the ability of the rest of us, to settle in two hours what is the right way to figure up what is a just compensation for taking over a billion or more of the property of the people of the United States.

Why not proceed in this case exactly as we did in the railroad situation in which in a short clause, in a rider on an appropriation bill, we gave the President the power to take over the railroads when in his judgment he deemed it an essential war measure? Now, then, why not leave the resolution as the committee has written it, which does exactly the same thing with relation to the telegraph and telephone lines in this country. Reposing confidence in the President of the United States and in his judgment, this committee has given him the power to take possession and take control and supervision of the telegraph and telephone lines. Just compensation is provided by the Constitution of the United States and by the law which gives the man whose property is taken for public use the right to go into the Court of Claims. If Congress wishes to fix some other means of ascertaining what is a just compensation, like that in the railroad bill, why not take the necessary time to consider it faithfully, as we did in the railroad bill?

I do not believe there is a man in this House who is not ready to vote, and vote now, on the resolution as it is written, which simply says that if the President under his responsibility deems it necessary to take over the telegraph and telephone lines during the continuance of the war, we are willing to give him that power. There is much more involved in the amendment of the distinguished gentleman from Wisconsin.

Who this afternoon in this House can tell how much is the capitalization of the telephone and telegraph lines? Who in this House this afternoon can tell how much watered stock there is in them, whether they are worth more than the par value of their stock? Who is there in this House who has had time or opportunity to figure out how much they have been making in the last two or three or four or five years? Are we ready and willing this afternoon to lay down a scheme for investigating how much they should have and to pass upon it by a solemn vote this afternoon as to what is the best way of ascertaining that?

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DEWALT], as he says, in the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce put in a provision for arbitration, that it should be settled by arbitration or agreement. That settles nothing. Who will appoint the arbitrators? How many are to be appointed by one side and how many by the other side, and who will represent the side of the Government as arbitrators? By agreement? Agreement between whom? That settles nothing. For my own part, if I were writing it on the spur of the moment, from what information I have, I would suggest that we leave to the Interstate Commerce Commission to figure it up and say what is fair and just, and then if they did not want to take that, to allow them to go into court and settle it, but that might not suit the rest of you. Every man in the House might have within his limit of opportunity for investigation some theory as to what is the best way to ascertain what is just compensation. But why settle that this afternoon in two hours? There is danger of doing an injustice to the owners, and there is even greater danger of paying them a great deal more for their property than they are entitled to receive. Why not let this go like the railroad bill went, give the President power to take them over, and then if the President in his discretion sees fit to take them over and does take them over, let the Congress, when it has time, after careful investigation by our committee or some other committee, bring in a bill providing what is the best way to settle the matter.

Mr. GOOD. Why does the gentleman say that we only have two hours in which to decide this great and monentous question?

Mr. DECKER. I say that because the House by solemn vote has agreed that there shall be only two hours of general debate upon this question.

Mr. GOOD. But that is only general debate.

Mr. DECKER. And there is but one paragraph in the resolution, and you can not have very much debate under the five-minute rule.

Mr. GOOD. There may be a great many amendments offered.

Mr. DECKER. I do not care how many amendments are offered, I want to say this, and say it solemnly: There has been no investigation by our committee; we have never given a hearing to the men who own the telegraph and telephone lines; we have heard nothing as to the compensation they should receive from the Secretary of the Navy, or the Secretary of War, or the Postmaster General. They all said before our committee that they did not know what was the best way, and had not given careful thought to that phase. Is there any harm in my calling attention to the fact that that important question has not been considered by anyone before our committee, and why should we settle it here in two hours, or a day, for that matter?

Mr. GOOD. The gentleman is aware of the fact that it is universally conceded by the membership here that this resolution will lie in the committee over in the Senate for about three weeks before it is reported out. Why should we not discuss this matter?

Mr. DECKER. I do not say that we should not discuss it.

Mr. GOOD. And solve the problem.

Mr. DECKER. All right, if you want to let it lie over there for three weeks and look up the matter, that suits me. I say, if we had the time to investigate, that it would be wiser to put in a provision for compensation, but I am opposed to settling it offhand.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD].

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, in my opinion it is not enough that this law, if it becomes a law, should cease with the expiration of the war. It should not be invoked during the war unless there is public necessity for it, and it should be made a part of the law that it shall not be invoked unless there is public necessity demanding it. It is an easy matter for this House in two hours to give the Government the right to take over millions and millions of dollars' worth of property, but when it comes to the administration of that property another proposition arises. We gave the Government the right to take over the railroads some time ago, thinking it to be a public necessity, and now, after months of experience, so far as the practical results are concerned, there is a very serious question whether or not we did any good by that act.

We do know we accomplished this result, that we have raised the freight rates and passenger fares on every line in this country. The railroads had been appearing before the Interstate Commerce Commission and asking for years that they be given an increase of 15 per cent on freight rates and stating that would be amply sufficient to pay all the increase of labor cost and to pay all the additional upkeep required by their roads. It was not granted to them, but when the Government took these railroads over it immediately proceeded to raise the freight rates 25 per cent, 10 per cent more than ever asked by the roads, and at the same time it has raised the passenger rates more than 50 per cent. Now, that is what has come as a result of that legislation so far as the dear people are concerned——

Mr. DENISON. And in many instances they have raised the freight rates 50 per cent.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. As suggested by the gentleman from Illinois, in many instances they have raised the freight rates 50 per cent. There are a great many people in this country who believe that if the railroads had been permitted to remain in the hands of the men who have been trained throughout a lifetime in the business of running railroads that we would not have had the congestion that we had last winter, and a great many men who are in a position to know whereof they speak declare that the millions and millions of bushels of corn that rotted and were not saved to the country at all would have been saved if the railroads had remained in the hands of the men who knew systematically how to operate them. So I say that unless there is a necessity for the taking over of these telephone and telegraph lines, a great public necessity, it should not be done. It is inconceivable to my mind that the thousands and thousands of independent telephone companies throughout this country should be taken over by this Government. It is inconceivable that there will public necessity arise for these independent telephones to be taken over; but in the event that they are taken over, what is going to happen? The same thing will happen that has already happened in regard to the railroads. There will be an increased wage paid to the employees; there will be an increase, if you please, of the charge for the telegraph. There will be an increased charge for telephone accommodations. We have not had anything presented here, I submit, that warrants our passing this law as a public necessity. Three Cabinet officers, I am informed, appeared before the committee. None of them, so far as we are informed in this body, gave any immediate necessity for this action. All three of them are advocates of Government ownership. Two of them did not base their opinion upon the Government taking over the telegraph and telephone companies upon the existence of an impending or threatened strike. Only one gave that as a possible excuse for taking them over. So I say, so far as this body is concerned, it has no warranted excuse to offer why these public utilities should be taken over. It should be embodied in this proposed law that these telephone and telegraph companies should not be taken over unless there is a public necessity then demanding it, growing out of the necessities of war.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I will.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I want to ask the gentleman what in his opinion will happen to the telephone companies in the country, the small telephone companies, if they are given the same treatment as the short-line railroads have been given by the Railroad Administration?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. The same thing will happen that has happened to them, but in a far greater degree; it will put them out of business. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT].

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, if it is necessary to take over this property, if the telegraph or telephone companies or their employees have in any way done anything to interfere or hamper the prosecution of this war, I and every Member of this House will, of course, eagerly vote for this proposition. I do not know in my own experience whether it is necessary for us to take these companies over. All the information we have on the subject is what has been given in this debate, and I am sorry to say that information is not as explicit as I would desire. At the same time the chairman of the committee and the chairman of the Committee on Rules tell us that in the opinion of the President this legislation is necessary. He knows what I do not about the executive necessities, and therefore I expect to vote for it. However, I wish to submit that it seems to me in a proposition of this kind we ought to have more definite and explicit information than the committee has given us, and I am somewhat skeptical about the urgency of this legislation, because the chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce has, as we all know, for some time been pressing for the legislation from his committee to be taken up by the House. Now, we all of us are apt to think that the legislation of our own committees is of supreme importance, and we are not to be blamed for that because it indicates a proper zeal for our own work. But the gentleman has been pressing his committee legislation. And then when this proposition very recently came up he volunteered letters to certain heads of the departments obviously to get their certificate of urgency. It is well known that the Secretary of War and the Postmaster General are most eager advocates of General Government ownership, and whether this was necessary for the war or not, of course they would write letters favoring it. When the telephone company here in Washington some time ago gave us wretched service, I remember that the Postmaster General rushed forward and volunteered to take it over, though I do not think any impartial person, in view of the service rendered by the Post Office Department, would have selected that as an agency for improved telephone service.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GILLETT. Certainly.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Did the gentleman understand, as I understood, that the resolution submitted to these gentlemen by the committee was not the resolution we are considering to-day, but the original Aswell resolution?

Mr. SIMS. The subject matter was the same.

Mr. GILLETT. It was the original Aswell resolution.

Mr. LONGWORTH. In other words, none of these gentlemen has indorsed the resolution we have here to-day.

Mr. GILLETT. I confess the resolution we have to-day is, to my mind, a great improvement over the original proposition, and just to the extent it is an improvement I presume the gentlemen to whom he referred the original would dislike it and prefer the original.

Mr. SIMS. And I have received word from some of them saying that they approve of the amendment.

Mr. GLASS. If the gentleman will permit, as to its being passed without amendment, it seems to me it ought not to be. It does not reserve to the States, for example, the right of taxation of these corporations, as was done in respect to the railroads, and that certainly ought to be taken care of.

Mr. GILLETT. I think there are several lines along which amendments should be made.

There is a rule of this House that communications from the heads of departments intended to be considered by committees should be sent to the Speaker of the House. I think it would be well if that rule had been adhered to here. I think, too, it would be well that we should not be informed of conclusions of the President indirectly over the telephone, through his secretary, or by personal letters. It is undignified and leaves room for question. And I think in a momentous matter of this kind, where we as individuals have no means of knowing the necessity, it would be well if we were informed by the highest authority—by the President—how much he may have been hampered, if at all, by the operations of these companies and how necessary they are to the prosecution of the war. I think we have a right to expect that we should receive such information to justify us in voting for this resolution. I am fundamentally opposed to Government ownership when unnecessary, because I think generally it renders poorer service at a higher cost, and the only excuse for this measure, to my mind, is war necessity. I regret that the committee, in its haste, has not given us more reliable information about that.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY].

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I can say but very little in three minutes about such an important measure. There has been no reason given so far to me why the Government should take over these 20,000 telephone exchanges. I assume the President of the United States feels that his son-in-law can manage them better than the 20,000 superintendents can manage them. Mark what I say: If the President decides, as the bill says, and nobody decides but the President, that it is advisable that he take those systems over, he will appoint Mr. McAdoo to direct them, although I have no criticism to make of Mr. McAdoo, who is an able gentleman, a highly respected man, very courteous, and a very dear friend of mine. We generally agree, except politically.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman is sure it will not be Mr. Burleson?

Mr. FORDNEY. I do not know. But it does not make any difference who it is. Nobody in the city of Washington can direct the management of 20,000 telephone exchanges in this country as well as can the 20,000 trained men situated in the localities where the telephone systems are located. Fifteen thousand of those telephone exchanges are independent. Mark what I say, and I measure my words: I have as much right to my own opinion as I have to take that of some other man, and it is only the opinion of one man that is provided for in that law to be exercised, but if the Government of the United States takes over these telephone exchanges and telegraph lines, you will find they will be used to the greatest political advantage of the Democratic Party in controlling the votes of the men employed by these exchanges, just as they have managed the railroad business.

Mr. QUIN. Does the gentleman believe that in this great emergency such a thing as that will be done?

Mr. FORDNEY. Oh, "great emergency!" I become nauseated with that expression, "great war measure." What is there about taking over the telephone exchange in the city of Washington or in any other city in this land that has any connection with this war? Tell me, and give me some reason, and I will vote with you. But none has been given. I am becoming angered over this thing. My goodness alive! a pension bill was presented here the other day as a war measure. Everything has war connected with it. What reason has any man given why the Government of the United States should control our telephone and our telegraph lines? Give me some reason, will you, and then, maybe, I can agree with you. I am becoming prejudiced in the matter, I fear, because I see so much political trickery going on. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HICKS] half a minute to make a request.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Chairman, as I am paired with the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. OLNEY], probably I shall not have the opportunity to express by my vote my opinion in regard to this measure. I am absolutely opposed to Government ownership of the telegraph and telephone systems of this country; but as this is a war-emergency measure, for military efficiency in the prosecution of the conflict, desired by the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, I am in favor of its passage. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill for amendment.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SNOOK], a member of the committee, seven minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio is recognized for seven minutes.

Mr. SNOOK. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I want to say that I am just as much opposed to Government ownership of the telephone and telegraph systems as the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY], who has just addressed the House. I expressed my opinion on that subject when we had before us the railroad legislation, and I said then, and I want to repeat it now, that I think there are plenty of men in this country big enough and honest enough and capable enough to operate the railroads or the telegraph or telephone systems of this country to the best advantage of the people of the country.

But I do not look at this resolution in the light that the gentleman from Michigan does. I do not apprehend that the President will take over all the telephone systems of the country, but I do apprehend that it may become necessary as a war emergency for him to take over some of the toll lines and trunk lines, and possibly it may be necessary to take over the telegraph lines. You see this resolution was amended, and for that particular purpose.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield for a question for information?

Mr. SNOOK. Yes.

Mr. COX. Under this provision would the President have the power to take over a little independent line in a county—say a line owned by farmers?

Mr. SNOOK. I think the President would have the power under this bill to take over any telephone or telegraph line that he might think a public necessity in time of war, and he could take over a whole system or a part of a system.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNOOK. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. There is a matter that has not been touched on in general debate, and that is a practical proposition—the regulation of rates and tolls to be charged in the event the President should see fit to take them over. What did the committee have in mind along that line?

Mr. SNOOK. I will be glad to answer the gentleman. The committee had in mind treatment of that subject as we treated the railroad situation. This is simply a resolution to empower the President in case the necessity arises to take over the telegraph and telephone systems. Then if he does that, Congress will exercise the power that it did in the railroad matter, and fix the rates and determine the way in which the matter should be handled.

Mr. WALSH. What is the necessity that might arise?

Mr. SNOOK. I was just coming to that. I want to reach that. Now, of course, this matter has probably been handled in a hurried manner, but we had before our committee—and that has not been discussed very much—the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, and the Postmaster General.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Why did you have those three Cabinet members and not the rest of them?

Mr. SNOOK. I am going to try to answer this other question, and that was put up to these men. This measure was proposed as a war measure, and it was thought necessary to have before our committee at least the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy. It has been said in the debates here many times that the Secretary of War is a Government-ownership man, and that the Postmaster General is a Government-ownership man, and I think that is so. But the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy, in discussing this matter before our committee, disclaimed any wish to take over these systems for that reason, and were particular to bring before the committee the fact that they would disdain to take advantage of the situation at this time to try to get the President to take over these systems because they believed in Government ownership. The Secretary of the Navy said to the committee that he had already—although there was very much doubt as to his power—taken over all the radio systems, and they were now being operated under governmental control; that he found such action absolutely necessary for the safe conduct of the war, and that in his opinion it was just as necessary that the President should have the power to take over the telegraph systems and the trunk-line telephone systems of the country as it was to take over the radio systems.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNOOK. Wait a moment until I answer the other question. You have not had an answer to that yet. In his opinion he thought it would be necessary, if we continued in the war, that the Government should have a right to exercise a control over the people who were sending these messages, the employees of the telegraph companies; otherwise there might be danger of secrets or plans by which the Government was carrying on the war leaking out and being disclosed.

Now, I will answer the gentleman's question.

Mr. GILLETT. I will ask whether there was not just as much power to take over the telegraph and telephone systems as the radio systems, and then why is not that in the bill?

Mr. SNOOK. I am not a great constitutional lawyer, as some Members of the House claim to be, but I am inclined to think that the President has the power, and the Secretary of the Navy was inclined to that opinion. But we thought that the President ought to be authorized by law, so that there would be no question on that subject. I think he said, as I remember, that they had consulted the Department of Justice on that question at the time the radio systems were taken over, but they still felt some doubt on the matter.

Mr. GILLETT. Did they say that cases had arisen where difficulties had been avoided?

Mr. SNOOK. I would not put it that strong. The hearings are not yet printed.

Mr. GILLETT. That is the trouble. We can not get access to the hearings.

Mr. SNOOK. The Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy both clearly indicated that such a crisis might arise. I do not say that it has arisen as to telegraphs and telephones; but as to the question of the radio system, they clearly indicated that such a certain crisis had arisen.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNOOK. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Is it not true that the Government censors all telegraph messages?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, the debate is becoming exceedingly interesting, and I think we should have a quorum here. I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Fifty-two Members present; not a quorum. The Doorkeeper will lock the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, when the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having under consideration House joint resolution 309, found itself without a quorum, whereupon he caused the roll to be called, when 223 Members answered to their names, and he reported the names of the absentees to be printed in the Journal and RECORD.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, by request of the Congressman from the Trenton, N. J., district, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by printing a speech that I made yesterday——

The SPEAKER. That request is not in order at this time. A quorum is present. The committee will resume its sitting.

The committee accordingly resumed its session, with Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky in the chair.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. MEEKER].

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Chairman, I think every man in this House has been thinking for months over the question as to the advisability of the Government taking control of the telegraph and telephone lines. There is no man here more positively opposed to Government ownership of these public utilities than I, and I would not have voted for a bill with such a proposal in it. I do believe, as a matter of military precaution, that the Government should have taken control of all these avenues of communication at the very outbreak of the war. It is not a question of expense. It is not a question of how the companies or the employees would like what is done. It is a question of giving the Government absolute management of all the avenues of communication which we may have at our disposal. We have been too lax and loose in safeguarding the governmental business by leaving these telegraph and telephone lines to be operated as they have been. But I want to say that the employees have been as loyal as any employees could be, but it is not good Government business in such a crisis as this. It is for that reason, and that reason only, I shall very gladly support this measure, whether the President asks for it or not. [Applause.]

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield six minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER].

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, it has been well noted by the gentleman from Massachusetts that there is no doubt now of the power of the President in case of need to do all that is granted by this resolution, he being the judge of whether there is real need therefor.

I confess that I am a little afraid always in the passage of any such resolution lest in the drawing of sentences we may either limit or enlarge the war power. That war power has been exerted by the Secretary of the Navy. The Secretary of the Navy found these great avenues of the air, filled with wireless messages all over the United States, under no control, that often had no offices that he could find out anything about, and he was forced to take possession and control. He did it in the right way, that I think ought to be provided in this bill, by providing for the taking control of the wireless companies, receiving all the tolls of the business and paying the expenses in trust for the companies. Where there were two companies claiming the same system of wireless he is piling up the profits for the one really entitled. It is a great pity that we have not that evidence before this House. I may say without breach of confidence that we were promised all that evidence on the day of the hearings—statements of the special arrangements and contracts—but they have not come yet, and that was four days ago.

Mr. ESCH. The gentleman knows that yesterday was the Fourth of July and the Printing Office was closed.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I do not want any printed matter. The copy has not come in. The written evidence has not come in.

Mr. ESCH. I am rather surprised at that.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. The copies or statements of the arrangements or contracts have not been sent to the committee clerk. One secretary has gone away, all are busy, and we have not got them. We would have liked to have had them.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there was also a cable company, which is nothing but a telegraph company, although a more dangerous one, because it goes across the Atlantic, and that cable company the United States have not taken possession of, but have put officers in the various offices of the cable company to censor the dispatches, and to see what is sent and received, and that is all that is needed—supervision. That is all that ought usually to be needed as to the various telegraph companies in this country. It was in that view that, at my suggestion, the word "supervise" was introduced into the resolution, so that two courses are open, either for the President to supervise the various systems of telegraph or to take possession of them. That supervision should, of course, go through the war, but it is hard to see why possession should be taken unless there is a strike or some other special emergency. I believe really we ought to change the words "for the duration of the war" to "for the duration of any special emergency," because even if we take possession for a strike, we ought to hold for the benefit of the companies and then return the systems, subject to supervision, the moment that special emergency is over. If it is not necessary to take the cables it is not necessary to take the telegraphs, and much less the other smaller things, the telephone companies. We should so express this that there would be no doubt about the President's power. The resolution should be put through in such form as will do what we want to do, and not bind the President to go beyond the emergency and take for the whole duration of the war. In this case there is no breakdown to force us to do as we did in the case of the railroads—take all of the receipts for ourselves and only pay a rent. It is not necessary here.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New Jersey has expired.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, the President of the United States has authority to supervise, to control, to take over all of the telegraph and all of the telephone systems of the United States if, in his judgment, it is necessary to do that for the national security and defense, for successful prosecution of the war, or any purpose necessary or essential to the conduct of the war. That being true, a resolution such as suggested is not, in my opinion, essential, and I doubt if it is wise. I do not feel disposed, the question having been brought before the House, to vote to withhold from the President authority to take over telegraph and telephone lines if he deems it essential so to do. I doubt the wisdom or necessity of having the matter brought before the House. Having been presented to the House, I regret it was not presented in the form of the resolution as offered by the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ASWELL], who presented it in the form of authorization based upon military necessity. The resolution we have before us is not based primarily upon military necessity. It is such a resolution as might be presented by any believer in State socialism, with a desire to take advantage of war conditions in order to have the Government embark in enterprises that ought to be left in the hands of individuals unless their taking over is essential to the prosecution of the war.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Did I understand the gentleman to say that the Aswell resolution presented the matter upon grounds of war necessity?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. MONTAGUE. If the gentleman will examine the resolution he will find that there is not one word or line basing it upon war necessity or war purposes.

Mr. MONDELL. Is not this the Aswell resolution that we have before us, as amended by the committee? I read:

> Mr. ASWELL introduced the following joint resolution, etc.:
> Resolved, That the President, if in his discretion it is deemed desirable, in order to insure their continuous operation, or to guard the secrecy of military and governmental communications—

And so forth.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Those things can be guarded in time of peace as well as in time of war.

Mr. MONDELL. As I view it, that resolution bases the taking over entirely of war necessities.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Will the gentleman permit me further?

Mr. MONDELL. I have only five minutes, and for the sake of argument I shall agree to any view that the gentleman takes.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The gentleman may be right, but the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ASWELL] has disclaimed the construction of the resolution the gentleman now imputes to him.

Mr. MONDELL. Then he did not understand the purport of his resolution. Possibly he did not draft it himself, because his resolution is clearly based upon military necessity, as it should be. What I fear is that this resolution will be taken and considered as an expression of opinion upon the part of the House as to the wisdom of taking over these lines. So far nothing has developed to indicate the wisdom of our doing so. The resolution should be amended so as to provide that the lines can only be taken over if necessary for the national security and defense.

It seems to me we have already taken over about as much of business of the country as we can for the time being properly conduct. We are not making a very great success of our railroad operation, and, it seems to me, it would be well to demonstrate the wisdom and success of that operation before we go further unnecessarily in ventures of this sort.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ESCH. I yield the gentleman one more minute.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, if we are to pass the resolution I am not in favor of amending it at all, unless it be to make it clear these agencies are only to be taken over if necessary in the prosecution of the war. Any legislation added to this authorization will be interpreted to carry with it congressional approval of the taking over of the lines. If we legislate in regard to compensation, with regard to State taxation and other matters, we are legislating as though we expected the taking over of the lines. I prefer leaving the resolution in the form of simple authorization based on military necessity. I do not think the provision with regard to compensation is necessary, because under the Constitution there must be compensation in any event if the lines are taken over, and the Congress can provide the necessary legislation if the lines are taken over and when they are taken over.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE], a member of the committee.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, I regret that the distinguished gentleman from Wyoming, whose ability we all recognize, should go so far afield in the construction of the resolution offered by the gentleman from Louisiana as to conclude that that resolution is based upon war considerations. I beg to suggest to the committee with great sincerity of conviction that there is not a line in it or word in it that would not authorize the President to take over the telephone and telegraph systems of this country in time of peace as well as in time of war. That resolution, so far as it has any military aspect or purpose is disclosed in these words:

To guard the secrecy of military or governmental communications—

We have military and naval communications in time of peace as well as in time of war. And these military and governmental communications are subject to safeguarding in time of peace, and are so guarded—or to prevent communications by spies and other public enemies.

Such laws exist practically in all nations, and are as appropriate to peace as to war. I think we already have laws applicable to spies and public enemies, and for the protection of our Government in times of peace against spies and enemies. It was for that reason I could not support the resolution of the gentleman from Louisiana, for I think, stripped of some little surplusage, its plain meaning and legislative purpose is to empower the President to exercise governmental control and possession of these public utilities in time of peace; certainly it so authorizes the President in peace as well as in war.

Mr. MONDELL. If that is the gentleman's view, and I am in harmony with the view, why does not the resolution itself expressly base the power on military necessity and not——

Mr. MONTAGUE. I think it does.

Mr. MONDELL. It says that the control can be only exercised in time of war, and there is not a word in the resolution basing the authorization on military necessity.

Mr. MONTAGUE. If it can be only exercised in time of war, then of necessity it can not be exercised in time of peace; and if only to be exercised in time of war its exercise of necessity rests only upon war considerations; that is, its exercise must of necessity be connected with military operations or administration for war purposes.

Mr. MONDELL. If the committee thought the amended Aswell resolution was put on war necessity I fear the committee did not accomplish what they set out to do.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The committee undertook not to improvise. It undertook to follow the precedent of Congress based on the knowledge and purpose of this House in dealing with Federal railroad control and operation for war purposes, and for those purposes alone.

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I have but a moment.

Mr. DENISON. I was going to ask the gentleman—I have not heard any members of the committee state it—whether there was shown to the committee in the hearings anything that indicated that the telegraph companies have disclosed any military secrets to the injury of the Government in any way?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I think not; I do not recall any such leakages or disclosure. I rose, however, because I did not wish this committee to be inadvertently misled by the observation which the gentleman from Wyoming has made, and therefore I addressed my opening remarks more particularly to his observation.

Mr. Chairman, I now wish to say that I shall submit to the committee at the proper time the amendment contained in the railroad-regulation act respecting taxation by the several States of these properties. This bill undertakes only to grant to the President certain powers. It does not undertake to regulate the exercise of these powers, presumably anticipating that later, if these properties are taken over, we would undertake regulatory legislation, as was done in case of the railroads. But out of abundant caution the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce made an addition which is perhaps unnecessary, namely, that just compensation be made for the lines taken over, in order that the law might exhibit in terms its compliance with the Constitution and the moral conscience of the Nation upon this subject.

I think we should go one step further and provide, and to that end I shall ask at the appropriate time the amendment found in section 11 of the bill, providing for the operation of the railroads, approved March 21, 1918, mutatis mutandis, be adopted in the present measure. The amendment I propose is—

That nothing in this act shall be construed to amend, repeal, empower, or affect existing laws or powers of the State in relation to taxation or the lawful police regulations of the several States, except wherein such laws, powers, or regulations may affect the transmission of Government communications on the issue of stocks and bonds.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SIMS. Will the gentleman from Wisconsin yield some of his time now?

Mr. ESCH. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, if it was clear that the President of the United States approved this resolution for war purposes, I would have no hesitation in supporting it, but I do not think that question has been settled yet to the satisfaction of the House. What the letters introduced by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] referred to was a resolution introduced by the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ASWELL]. They had no reference to this resolution whatever. This resolution came up from the committee. The letters that have been read, including the letter from the President, which indorsed a letter from the Postmaster General, referred to another resolution altogether. There is absolutely nothing before the committee to show that the President of the United States approves this specific resolution.

Now, this resolution is a dangerous resolution, a very dangerous one. If the President undertakes to exercise the power which is conferred upon him by this resolution through any agency, for instance, the Postmaster General, he may put out of business one large telegraph company by the encouragement of another telegraph company and the transfer of the employees of one company to another company. He may play favorites if he sees fit. For war purposes? It is not so stated in the bill. "War purposes" is not specifically stated in the bill. For business that does not pertain to war, during the period of the war, one company before an election may be favored as against another company. The director general may state to one company that seeks to unload its property upon the Government, "We will take you over," and it would be a great favor to that company to do it. He may state to another company if that company does not desire to come in under Government control, "We will take you over" or "We will not," as the case may be. He may state to a hundred smaller companies, "We will take you in" or "Leave you out." "We will take in your competitor and destroy you." It is not said specifically in this resolution that the power is to be exercised for the purposes of the war. It may be exercised for political purposes for all this resolution says. The private business of a man who seeks to send a telegram will be subject to the scrutiny of his enemy under this bill. Suppose some one is conducting a political campaign, every telegram, every word, every message he desires to send will be subject to the scrutiny and oversight of gentlemen in opposition. This is a measure that ought to be debated a little more fully in this House. There is no penalty here attaching to a man who divulges information that comes to him by virtue of his position in a telephone or telegraph office. There ought to be some such penalty.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS] five minutes.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, the amendment reported by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce is like a battleship stripped for action. Everything superfluous has been thrown overboard. It is a plain, simple grant of essential and necessary power, and should be adopted by this body without the excision or addition of a single line.

Some question has been raised in the progress of the debate, about Government ownership. That question can not properly arise in this connection. It is utterly foreign to the subject under consideration, just as foreign as the suggestion made, I believe by the gentleman from Massachusetts, that the President already enjoys the power to do the very things that this resolution proposes to authorize him to do. It is rather late for anyone to raise that question in this House which, without objection on the part of anyone on either side of the Chamber, has heretofore given to the President analogous grants of power with respect to a number of subjects. We have given him the right to take over and operate street car lines running to shipyards; we have given him the right to take over and operate shipyards; we have given him the right to take over ships. If the gentleman from Massachusetts is correct in his present attitude, then all of these grants of powers were superfluous and unnecessary.

Yet they have been afforded by this body without objection or protest by a single Member. I repeat that no question of Government ownership can be raised under this resolution, and maintain that this statement is absolutely true.

There is a considerable school of thought in this country that would have the Government operate permanently the railroad, telegraph, and telephone lines. There is another and smaller school of thought that would have the Government operate not only these instrumentalities but many industries. But amid the perturbations and excitements of war Congress should not undertake to impose those policies or any one of them upon the country, nor does this resolution propose to do anything of the sort.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. In a moment. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] undertakes to criticize this resolution on the ground that it is vague, uncertain, and indefinite. Whatever other criticism may be properly directed against this resolution, certainly this particular criticism does not and can not attach.

The resolution states that in time of war the President is authorized to take over, and operate telegraph, telephone and radio facilities. Could anything be more specific, definite, and certain than this grant of power which is limited to the period of the war? The resolution is by its terms self-limited. Why is it, then, that in connection with this resolution this ghost of Government ownership should be raised? There is no one in this Chamber more opposed to Government ownership of these facilities than I am, and I would not vote for this resolution even under the suggestion that it was a war necessity, if it contemplated permanent Government operation of the instrumentalities to which it relates. But the great beauty and merit of this resolution is that it absolutely limits the grant of power afforded to the period of the war. Of course it goes without saying that, being limited to the war, it is by necessary implication a grant of war power, to be exercised for the purpose of enabling this country the more successfully to conduct the great enterprise in which we are now engaged.

I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. DENISON. The gentleman has referred to the ghost of public ownership having been raised in connection with this bill.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. DENISON. Is not that because it has been urged by the Postmaster General, who is known to be in favor of Government owneship of telegraphs and telephones?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. The Postmaster General does not recommend the proposition reported to the committee and now pending in this body. I have nothing to do with the private, individual views of the Postmaster General with respect to any public question, nor has any other Member of this House. We are not dealing with what is in the mind of the Postmaster General, but with the questions presented to this body for our consideration.

Mr. DECKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. DECKER. If the gentleman will allow me to state in that connection, in his testimony before the committee the Postmaster General specifically asserted that his recommendation of this measure at this time, or the original measure, was only as a war measure.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I understand that to be so. But it is further true, I believe, that the Postmaster General favors Government ownership, and operation of telegraph and telepone lines. But that attitude on his part, is not relevant to this resolution which is a simple grant of power to the President to be exercised during the pendency of the present war. Cessante bello, cessat ipsa potestas.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Wisconsin yield some further time?

Mr. ESCH. I have only one other speaker on this side.

Mr. SIMS. Then I yield five minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I rise primarily to express one thought in the way of a query. This bill is presented and the House is asked to consider it hastily. There are evidences that much haste has been made by the committee. The hearings have not yet been printed. No provision has been made in the bill for reserving the right of taxation or for an agreement involving compensation to the telegraph and telephone companies, nor the various other provisions that were considered necessary in the railroad bill. We have been in session here for some months. This original resolution by the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ASWELL], I understood him to state, was introduced by him in January. Why has the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce just found it necessary to give consideration to this measure? Why is it necessary that this House shall consider it now, just before a recess is contemplated?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SMALL. I have only a few minutes at my disposal.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Just a question.

Mr. SMALL. Very well.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Why is it that the demand that the water-power bill should be considered has disappeared so suddenly and this demand takes its place? Why is it?

Mr. SMALL. Does any man assume that the Senate will pass this important bill as hastily as the House shall have passed it? I am asking this question: To what extent has the threat of a strike by the employees of the telegraph companies hastened the consideration of this bill? If that has been the moving factor that has induced anybody in responsibility to say that the haste was necessary, then, for one, I think the time has come for the Congress of the United States to consider which is superior, the Government or any organized body of men. I believe that we must consider sooner or later legislation which shall forbid a strike by the employees of any public utility. [Applause.]

It is unthinkable that any organized body of men, no matter with what skill they pursue their vocation or how necessary they may be, shall hold in the hollow of their hands the continuous operation of a utility upon which the public service, the public welfare, or the public health may depend. Some two or three years ago I read a very able address or communication by the president of the University of Wisconsin elaborating this thought.

I am entirely willing, if the exigencies of this war require it, if the successful prosecution of the war demands it, to vote readily and immediately for this legislation; but if we are called upon to enact this legislation at the behest and on the threat and demand of a body of men who are the employees of these public utilities, then I say the time has come to consider seriously whether all the people, as represented by the Government of the United States, are supreme or whether they will delegate their sovereignty to any organized body of men, whether it be an organization of laborers or manufacturers or capitalists. I would like to know, and I propound it as a query, and I would like to have the information, if any gentleman can furnish it, as to what occasioned this haste and the preparing of a bill so hastily that the able members of the committee admit they did not have time to formulate a complete bill containing all the provisions essential to protect the United States and also the owners of the telegraph and telephone companies proposed to be taken over by the President. Will some member of the committee enlighten us? [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. ROUSE having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Tulley, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the bill (H. R. 12580) to authorize an additional issue of bonds to meet expenditures for the national security and defense, and, for the purpose of assisting in the prosecution of the war, to extend additional credit to foreign governments, and for other purposes.

ELECTRICAL COMMUNICATING SYSTEMS.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. SIMS. I will state to the gentleman from Wisconsin that there will be only one more speech on this side.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose, and Mr. CRAGY having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Tulley, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10069) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

ELECTRICAL COMMUNICATING SYSTEMS.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. ESCH. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH].

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I am sure the entire membership of the House are proud and willing to congratulate this great and powerful committee which brought forth this tremendous proposition for our consideration here to-day, and to commend the illuminating report which they have submitted, which accompanies this great measure; a report consisting of 22 or 23 lines, simply setting forth the substitute resolution which they offer. There is not one word in the report as to the necessity for this legislation, as to the arguments in favor of it, or as to any statements of facts made before the committee. I believe it was the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS] who said that this resolution was like a battleship stripped for action. Yes; it is like a battleship stripped for action, with its crew aboard, without any coal in its bunkers, without any food or provisions or ammunition aboard the ship, without any chart or direction under which that battleship is to sail; and he, I think, will admit that we shall have to follow the same course that we followed with the railroad law, and supplement this authorization with other legislation, and with an appropriation to make it effective.

Here is a proposition to take over property worth many millions of dollars, I imagine, with thousands of employees, and not one word in this report as to how it is to be done, as to the exact purpose of the legislation, or how or by what person this tremendous power is to be specifically exercised. The Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee have had to deal with some of the most important problems touching upon this war. They have done it ably and intelligently, but I think it is ridiculous to bring in a measure of this importance and confine the report to these few lines, without setting forth any facts.

But they say there is a recess pending. Well, if the gentlemen who have written these letters which the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] read, and who are urging this legislation, are really insistent upon it, hopes for a recess have gone into the discard, because we all well know that this resolution must go away from here and must be considered somewhere else where they do not jam things through under rules for two hours' debate. It may have been possible that there was no more information contained in this report, because the gentleman in charge of it seeks to set it forth in an eloquent speech to members of the Committee of the Whole, and that therefore it is unnecessary to advance the arguments in favor of it. But I submit that we should be assured beyond any doubt that this is a war necessity. They talk about no question of Government ownership being involved here. It presents directly the question of Government ownership, and that will arise in the future just as the railroad legislation which we have passed presents a question of Government ownership. A propaganda is at work along these lines to present that question to the Congress for legislation when this war is over, and a propaganda will be stimulated to present the question as to these activities and facilities when this war is over. I think this should be confined to the duration of the present war and let the future take care of itself as far as legislation along that line is concerned.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I want to inform the gentleman from Washington with reference to the water-power bill. That does not come from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, but from a special water-power committee. The bill has been reported and has been on the calendar for a number of days. I have introduced a special rule for the purpose of having consideration and in the preamble have given reasons why I think it ought to be considered before the recess, if one is had. If the gentleman from Washington, with his well-known ability, will work to have that rule reported, we will have a water-power bill passed before the recess is taken.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I am as much interested in the passage of necessary water-power legislation as anyone, but if this telegraph and telephone measure has been shot in here in an effort to get it through and have it dealt with in another body, so that this House while waiting will be able to take up the water-power legislation, I think a trick has been played on the House.

Mr. SIMS. I thought the gentleman made his inquiry in good faith.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. It was made in good faith.

Mr. SIMS. The inference is offensive.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I did not so intend it. In attending to his duties as chairman of the special committee on water power, and in his capacity as chairman of the very important Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, I realize that the gentleman has had and still has a great deal of very hard work on hand. It is unfortunate that two pieces of rush-order legislation should be in his hands at the same time.

Mr. SIMS. The water-power bill was reported a number of days ago before this measure was introduced. Now, Mr. Chairman, I have very few words to say about this matter. The gentleman from Massachusetts wants to be informed by a long report of the committee and no one would have been more anxious to do that than myself. But looking at the resolution, which is in the exact language, word for word, of the act of 1916 under which the railroads were all taken over, and then considering the great railroad-control bill as we did for many weeks, in which every question pertaining in nature and substance to this resolution was discussed, I thought it would be an assumption on my part to repeat at great length in a report information which everybody knows. The resolution here is plain and it needs no explanation, especially as the same subject matter was fully explained and fully discussed in the two acts of Congress referring to the taking over of the roads and their control.

I do not want to take any more time. This resolution is only to enable the President to take control of the telegraph and telephone lines should it become necessary in the prosecution of the war and to operate them.

I am not prepared to say that it will not become necessary, but I hope it will not become necessary, and if it does not it will not be done. Therefore there was no use in a long program of detailed legislation as to the operation, as to the compensation, in advance of whether or not it would ever become necessary to consider such legislation. If it is found necessary by the President to exercise the power herein conferred, as a matter of course Congress will do as it did in the railroad-control matter. There will be supplementary legislation to take care of every question that will arise, and it will not be railroaded through the House without ample time for consideration. The gentleman knows there is a special extraordinary occasion and necessity for the passage of this resolution. I did not want my committee or the House to be responsible for inaction. I am going to ask the committee to remain here until the resolution is disposed of to-night.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman state what that urgent necessity is?

Mr. SIMS. It has been referred to on the floor and in the public prints.

Mr. WALSH. Is it something that the gentleman does not care to have mentioned on the floor of the House?

Mr. SIMS. It has been mentioned in the public press that a strike has been ordered to take place which will affect the Western Union employees by next Monday, just as the railroad strike was called in September, when the House rushed through the Adamson bill and the President signed it on Sunday, when the strike was called for Monday, Labor Day. We were not in war then and we are now.

Mr. Chairman, I ask that the resolution be read for amendment.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and four Members present, a quorum. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the President, if in his discretion it is deemed desirable, in order to insure their continuous operation, or to guard the secrecy of military and governmental communications, or to prevent communication by spies and other public enemies thereon, or for other military or public reasons, shall have power to take possession and control of any telegraph, telephone, marine cable, or radio systems, and operate the same subject to those conditions of law, so far as applicable, which are in force as to steam railroads while under Federal control.

With the following committee amendment:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

"That the President in time of war is authorized and empowered to supervise or to take possession and assume control of any telegraph, telephone, marine cable, or radio system or systems, or any part thereof, and to operate the same in such manner as may be needful or desirable for the duration of the war, which supervision, possession, control, or operation shall not extend beyond the date of the proclamation by the President of the exchange of ratifications of the treaty of peace: Provided, That just compensation shall be made for such supervision, possession, control, or operation."

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 14, after the word "operation," strike out the period, insert a comma, and add the following: "to be determined by the President, and if the amount thereof so determined by the President is unsatisfactory to the person entitled to receive the same, such person shall be paid 75 per cent of the amount so determined by the President and shall be entitled to sue the United States to recover such further sum as, added to such 75 per cent, will make up such amount as will be just compensation therefor in the manner provided by section 24, paragraph 20, and section 145 of the Judicial Code."

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, this provision is taken literally from the deficiency act approved June 15, 1917, whereby the President was given authority to take over ships, shipyards, ship plants, and so forth. Under that act, as I am informed, already something like $400,000,000 or $500,000,000 worth of property have been taken over, and no cases have been taken to the courts for adjudication. With that example before us, it seems to me we will be justified in applying the same method of arriving at an adjustment with the telephone, telegraph, cable, and wireless companies. Unless we put this provision in there will be no opportunity, in fact, there would be no law, for these small, independent lines to go into the Court of Claims at all. Under the circumstances, it seems to me that we can well afford to put this addition on to the resolution in order to give a proper financial status to those various independent lines and not leave them suspended between heaven and earth, as is the case now with the small short-line railroads. They will at once, if taken over, secure at least 75 per cent, which will be sufficient to keep them from bankruptcy. The balance will be subject to adjustment. I discussed this matter in opening the debate, and I do not care to take any longer time now.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ESCH. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Can the gentleman give any estimate as to the value of all the telegraph lines and the value of all the telephone lines that are capable of being taken over under the general authorization of the resolution now pending?

Mr. ESCH. I have seen an estimate proposed, I think, by the Post Office Department that the total valuation of the telephone and telegraph lines may reach the grand total of $10,000,000,000. Whether that can be confirmed or not, I do not know. Take the A. T. & T., which is the successor of the Bell. I understand it has combined assets, if I recollect right, of over $1,100,000,000. In that way we can get some estimate of the enormous property values involved in the resolution.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman know how many employees of these companies are involved?

Mr. ESCH. I think the Western Union has 20,000 employees.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does it run as high as 200,000?

Mr. ESCH. I do not think it would go as high as that.

Mr. DENISON. If the President should exercise authority and take over these properties, would not additional legislation become necessary?

Mr. ESCH. Possibly, but I hope not, in view of the experience we have had in reference to the taking over of shipyards, ships, and so forth. There has been no need of additional legislation in reference to that, and yet the property interests involved there, as I have already stated, are enormous.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Under the radio act, which was framed by the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, the President was given power in an emergency like this to take over the radio plants, and shortly after the war in Europe began he took over the Marconi, the Federal, and all other plants, and has been operating them ever since under an arrangement with the companies by which they get the revenues, but their employees were sworn into the Government service and have conducted the business. And there is no reason why this should not be done, this extension of power with the telegraph and telephones which is now being exercised under the radio act as regards radio communications.

Mr. ESCH. That is very true. That is why we put in this resolution the words "to supervise or to take possession and assume control."

Mr. GLASS. Will the gentleman yield for an interruption?

Mr. ESCH. Yes.

Mr. GLASS. If that be so, if the gentleman thinks there need be no subsequent legislation, would not it be better to add a provision here with reference to reserving to the States the right to tax these corporations just as we did in the railroad matter?

Mr. ESCH. I wish to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact we took over these railroad properties and operated them for some months before any legislation was had regarding taxation, compensation, or anything else.

Mr. GLASS. Well, but I understood the gentleman to say no subsequent legislation would be required here. If that be true, should not we legislate as to this particular matter now?

Mr. ESCH. I do not think that would necessarily follow.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, if we were now providing legislation for the operation and control of these telephone and telegraph wires there is no question in my mind but that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin would be a good amendment, that is seeking the same purpose, but just as the gentleman from Virginia says, if we commence trying to provide details in this resolution there is no telling where it will end, because there is the taxing provision and everything else. Now, I want to say this is the unanimous report of the committee and I hope there will be no amendment put on it for the purpose of determining the method of operation or things of that sort, not that I am opposed to the purpose and object of the amendment. I think it will be good as part of supplemental legislation, but I want to say to the gentleman from Wisconsin I have not a particle of doubt that if this authority is exercised that it will be not only needed but absolutely necessary that subsequent legislation in which the provision to which he refers and legislation along that line, tax provision and all those things, will be taken care of as in the railroad-control bill.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. I will.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Why did the committee put at the end the statement that just compensation should be made?

Mr. SIMS. That is practically the words of the Constitution of the United States, that is all there is in that. Some of the members of the committee thought in order to make the resolution clearly constitutional that that language be in it because it has been in some legislation already had regarding such matters.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. If the gentleman will permit me to make a further inquiry of the gentleman, does the gentleman seriously contend that the phraseology is necessary to make this resolution constitutional?

Mr. SIMS. I personally do not; I really do not think so, but the committee thought so, and there are more lawyers on that committee than myself and better ones, and I am here representing the wisdom of the committee, and hope that no amendment will be adopted to this resolution.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. The committee did not intend that would prescribe the method of compensating, but simply a suggestion of the policy that will be carried out?

Mr. SIMS. No method at all, Mr. Chairman, I ask for a vote.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, it is late, and I do not wish to take up unnecessarily the time of the committee; but this is an exceedingly interesting matter—exceedingly important, rather. If there were any good reasons given why this is a war measure or that the Government needed Government control of our telegraph lines and our telephone lines, I would willingly support it, as I have all measures that I thought were necessary to aid in carrying on this war. Here is an immense value of property, and no hearings given to the owners of the property. That, to me, seems to be absolutely absurd on the part of Congress, to take over from the owners millions of dollars' worth of property without giving the owners anything to say about it. If the President of the United States had come to Congress and asked the Congress of the United States to repeal the Sherman antitrust law and give such powers to the railroads as Congress has conferred upon the Government, and that the Government has exercised, there would be no necessity whatever for taking over the railroads under the control of the Federal Government. In the first place, the Congress of the United States for the past 10 or 12 years and the different legislative bodies of the States in this country have been making laws adverse to the interests of the railroads of the country. They are the most important industry of the country to the great agricultural, mining, and manufacturing interests of this country.

Of what value would your great wheat fields of the Dakotas or of Montana be to this country to-day if it were not for the railroads that transport the wheat to the people? Yet every measure that has passed Congress for 10 years has been curbing the railroads, taking away from them the power to operate under their own management. In what sort of a situation would any industry of this country be to-day if you fixed the value of the product of its factory and permitted the cost of production to run wild, as has been the case with the railroads? Legislation in this country prevented the railroads from adding 1 penny to their income from freight or passenger fares but permitted their cost to continually rise. During the year 1916 the railroads of this country received from freight $2,400,000,000. I speak in round numbers. The Interstate Commerce Commission has steadily declined to permit the railroads of the country to increase their freight and passenger rates, but the Government now comes and permits the railroads, or directs, rather, an increase of 25 per cent in freight rates, which means that $600,000,000 will be collected this year on freights over the amount collected last year. And now comes an increase of 50 per cent in the passenger fares to the travelers of this country. What for? To pay the added expense of operating the railroads, as the Government now claims and actually recognizes. Therefore, the increase on freight rates and passenger rates allowed by the Government will be $1,000,000,000 annually in addition to the receipts by the railroads from freight and passengers heretofore.

If we had given the railroad companies the power—the 750 railway systems, managed by 750 great, highly educated, and trained experts—the rights that we have given to the President of the United States, there would have been no necessity for taking over the railroads, the roads would have had plenty of funds to pay increased wages and to have made betterments much needed this long time. Look at the deplorable situation prevailing to-day. Under Government control the business of the country in some lines has been paralyzed. There is no question about that. The employees are independent and in many instances uncivil. They care not for the public now, but when they were servants of the railroad companies and under the direction and management of the various systems they were most courteous, or they lost their positions. What do you find now? Independence. Some one has asked how many people are employed by the telegraph and telephone lines of the country. I believe my statistics are correct, although I am not positive, to the effect that there are 235,000 employees in the telegraph companies alone.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STEELE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

I shall address my remarks exclusively to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH]. I confess when I first read this resolution the question which he has raised also occurred to my mind. Upon reflection, however, and a more careful examination of the legal status of that question, I was firmly convinced that under the law and the decisions of the Supreme Court it is absolutely unnecessary in this resolution.

It is true the Constitution provides that just compensation shall be made for all property taken by the Federal Government. It was therefore unnecessary to insert the last phrase of this resolution, because there is already a constitutional provision for it, which is superior to any act of Congress.

Now, it is also a rule that where property is taken, provision must be made for the payment of it when the property is taken by private interests, but when the property is taken by State or Federal authority the taxing power is always regarded as adequate security for the payment of any property which may be taken, and all it is necessary to do is to provide an adequate remedy for the party to pursue. It is claimed there is no adequate remedy specifically provided in this resolution, but it is not necessary to provide it in this resolution, where an adequate remedy already exists by the legislation of Congress.

Under the act of Congress creating the Court of Claims provision was specifically made that the Court of Claims should have jurisdiction wherever any claim arose, either under the Constitution or under an act of Congress or where the claim shall have arisen under a contract, express or implied, between the Government and the claimant. Therefore, this being a claim for property taken under express authority of the Government under an act of Congress and under a provision of the Constitution, express jurisdiction is given to the Court of Claims for the consideration of claims of this character.

Mr. DEWALT. Will the gentleman permit me?

Mr. STEELE. Yes, sir.

Mr. DEWALT. And that applies to all cases whether the damages be liquidated or unliquidated, except in cases of tort.

Mr. STEELE. Absolutely so. Now, if there is any doubt arising with reference to this, I would refer to the decision of the Supreme Court in the Great Falls case, reported in One hundred and twelfth United States. It arose under precisely the same circumstances as the question arises here.

In that case the act of Congress authorized the taking of certain lands for the construction of the waterworks of the Great Falls of the Potomac. No remedy was provided for the payment of the damages, and the case was presented to the Court of Claims, and the question arose as to whether the Court of Claims had jurisdiction, there being no specific provision in the act of Congress authorizing the taking of the land. The Supreme Court held that it had adequate jurisdiction of the claim.

I may say in passing that the same question was practically decided in another respect where private property was actually taken and the jurisdiction of the circuit court was sustained, where suit was brought as a common-law remedy under an implied contract with the Government to pay when it took the land from the private owner. Therefore in another aspect, either under these decisions, or under the act of Congress vesting jurisdiction in the Court of Claims, an adequate remedy is furnished to the telegraph or telephone company to have their damages assessed in either court.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. SIMS. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN].

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Chairman, I listened to the speech of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] in the general debate and also to his speech under the five-minute rule. The gentleman in the former speech insinuated that the President of the United States might wish to turn over the telegraph lines of the country to his son-in-law.

I submit to this House and to the country that no such suggestion is proper at a time like this; no such suggestion can shake the faith of the American people in this great President of the United States. He has the love and the confidence of the American people. He is entitled to the loyal support of every Member in this House, on both sides, and ill does it become gentlemen, when situations are arising that make it necessary for him to lay the hand of the governmental authority upon the great railroad systems of the country and the telegraph systems of the country, to throw off on the grave situation that exists by making the miserable suggestion that the President of the United States is trying to turn over the control of property to his son-in-law.

Gentlemen, the election is fast approaching. Gentlemen on both sides of this House who are constantly getting up here and belittling the efforts of the administration in the handling of these great war measures ought to be defeated at the polls, and I hope that they will be defeated. The President is entitled to the united support of this Congress in handling railroads and in handling telegraph lines. They are public utilities, not bigger than the Government, and when the President sees a strike impending and it is necessary, in order to carry on war operations, to have authority to take over public utilities and operate them. Gentlemen should aid him and not hamper and hinder him by their nagging, such as we have had here by some gentlemen to-day.

I know we have had congestion in railroad traffic. We have had such traffic as never was known before in the history of the country, incident to the moving of war materials, the moving of soldiers, of people going from home to the camps. Such traffic the country has never seen before. There has been congestion. That congestion was not relieved until McAdoo took charge of the system by the authority of the Government. Now, they are moving along better than ever before, although not in an entirely satisfactory manner yet, because of the tremendous traffic.

Gentlemen, threats are being made to strike in the great telegraphic system of the country. The Government must be ready to prevent that. Nothing must be permitted to weaken the arm of this Government. We are fighting the bloodiest monarch that ever existed on the earth. The Government is solidly behind Woodrow Wilson, and I want the few men who are not supporting our great leader in this war against the Hun defeated in November.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves to strike out the last two words.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, a question of order. A parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. STAFFORD. As I understand the legislative situation, we are now considering——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has recognized the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then I make the point of order, Mr. Chairman, that you can not offer an amendment in the third degree.

Mr. CANNON. Let us have a vote on the amendment. It is a pro forma amendment to strike out the last word.

Mr. STAFFORD. I will withdraw the point of order to allow the gentleman from Pennsylvania to proceed.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, there is an amendment pending. We can vote on it.

Mr. CANNON. It is a formal amendment to strike out the last word. If you want a vote on it, it will take only a moment.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania addressed the committee. [See Appendix.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, before the question is put I would like to address an inquiry to the chairman of the committee with a view to perfecting the text in the event that he agrees with me as to the construction to be put upon this amendment. According to the terms of the amendment of the committee, there are two alternatives given to the President in the disposition of the property to be taken control of. In the first instance the President may supervise these properties. I direct attention to the language of the amendment. He may supervise, or on the other hand he may take control of and operate the properties.

Mr. SIMS. Take possession of.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Yes; take possession of and operate the properties. Now, in the provision of the amendment which provides for compensation, I notice that you say "that just compensation shall be made for such supervision, possession, control, or operation." Now, is it in contemplation that in the event that the President decides to supervise the properties compensation shall be given to the companies?

Mr. SIMS. That is a very pertinent question, and it was raised in the committee, and it was insisted by some members of the committee that even Government supervision might in a way damage the companies; and so, rather than have any quibble or quarrel about it, we just let it go. I take the same view that the gentleman apparently does, that it is unnecessary.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Does not the gentleman think it will open the door for demands and claims made by these companies?

Mr. SIMS. I do not think there is the remotest possibility of the Government taking supervision because they are now supervised by different States.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH].

The question was taken; and on a demand for a division (by Mr. DECKER) there were 66 ayes and 61 noes.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 10, after the words "duration of," insert the words "any emergency or necessity therefor during," so that it will read:

"That the President in time of war is authorized and empowered to supervise or to take possession and assume control of any telegraph, telephone, marine cable, or radio systems or systems, or any part thereof, and to operate the same in such manner as may be needful or desirable for the duration of any emergency or necessity therefor during the war, which supervision, possession, control, or operation shall not extend beyond the date of the proclamation by the President of the exchange of ratifications of the treaty of peace."

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, only a word: At present, as the amendment is drawn, it forces the President to take the lines for the duration of the war. We should want to give the President the right to hold them while he thinks it is necessary and to give them up as soon as he thinks it is unnecessary. He may prefer to supervise in most cases. If he takes possession during a strike, he may want to give them back to the company the moment the strike is over. If for some other reason he wants to give them back, I want him to have the power, and my amendment gives him that power.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. PARKER of New Jersey) there were 39 ayes and 57 noes.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, at the end of the last paragraph, add the following:

"Provided further, That nothing in this act shall be construed to amend, repeal, impair, or affect the existing laws or powers of the States in relation to taxation or the lawful police regulations of the several States except wherein such laws, powers, or regulations may affect the transmission of Government communications or the issue of stocks and bonds by such system or systems."

Mr. ESCH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Yes.

Mr. ESCH. Is that language the language of the railroad act?

Mr. MONTAGUE. It is, except that the language of the railroad act is "transportation of troops, war materials, and Government supplies." Of course, that language is inapplicable to this bill, and I simply used the language "Government communications," which would embrace all communications by wire or telephone.

Mr. DECKER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to speak in opposition to the amendment. Mr. Chairman, I think we are making a mistake in putting these amendments onto this grant of authority. I want it understood that I do not object to the principles enunciated by my distinguished colleague from Virginia, a member of the committee, but I do not believe at this time that we should do more in this resolution than to give the simple grant of authority to the President to take over the telegraph and telephone lines the same as we did in the railroad situation, leaving it to a later time to provide for a method of compensation and for other regulations that we in our careful and mature judgment may deem necessary for the successful and efficient operation of these instrumentalities. I think it would be unwise to raise the questions here that ought not to be raised, because in this resolution as presented by the committee we provide for one thing, and one only, and that is that if the President in his wisdom shall deem it essential to the winning of this war he shall have the power to take over the telegraph and telephone lines.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DECKER. Certainly.

Mr. FESS. Will not the amendment operate as a limitation so that the President taking over the telephone and telegraph lines under the authority granted must take them over subject to the limitations attached?

Mr. DECKER. That is true, and I make the suggestion that it is true of the one we just adopted here, and it is far-reaching.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Does the gentleman carry in his mind the distinction between regulation and limitation? We in this committee have not brought in any measure of a regulatory character. The amendment that I propose is simply an amendment of limitation and preservation of existing powers.

Mr. DECKER. Mr. Chairman, I will be frank with the gentleman and say that I think there is less danger in this amendment proposed by him than in the one that we have just adopted. I think the amendment as to determining the method of compensation is very far-reaching. It is copied after the one in the law for taking over the shipyards, and if you will stop to consider, the business of running a shipyard is not at all similar to the business of operating a public utility. I speak here in opposition to all amendments that go to the question of operation or compensation, believing that we should plant our feet on the solid rock of giving the President authority to take them over, and leaving to the future the question of how to determine just compensation and the question of regulations and limitations, which we will have more time to fix later, after he has taken them over.

These questions should be settled only after mature deliberation, after careful investigation, after going into the questions by our committee of the finances of these companies and the different provisions that should be made; but here extemporaneously, as it were, we are passing a patched-up resolution, copying after the one which commandeered the shipyards, copying after the railroad bill. In other words, we are making up a piece of legislation which is patchwork, piecemeal, whereas the committee, if it were followed, would have a plain, straightforward, concise grant of power to the President to take over the telegraph and telephone lines for the purpose of winning the war. Instead of mixing it up with these other propositions, I believe we should adopt the resolution as it is and leave the other questions for future and more careful consideration.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say a few words with reference to the amendments. I agree with every word the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DECKER] has said, but we have passed an amendment more far-reaching than this amendment. This amendment is only a question of saving to the States the matter of taxation. I was anxious that no amendment should be offered or accepted, just like the gentleman from Missouri, but if we do not get this resolution passed your amendments will not be worth anything, and I do hope that we may have a vote in as short a time as possible.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I rise to speak upon the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. All debate upon the amendment is exhausted.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I move to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, it is most remarkable that when we have a measure of this importance before the House, even a few words of debate are not considered proper. The gentleman who is the chairman of the committee which brought this resolution before the House is a man for whom I have the highest respect, but I am sure that he spoke very hastily when he said we ought to go ahead regardless of anything with the passage of this resolution. I am opposed to the passage of resolutions of this importance in the manner in which this has been taken up and brought before the House, and I warn the gentleman that he will have trouble with it in consequence. The hasty passage of these measures through the House has already caused difficulty and conflict. Already we have been compelled to amend the railroad bill.

We do not take enough time with these matters, and as a result we have differences as to the meaning of the acts passed and disputes as to their construction. We are having conflict now between the authorities who undertake to enforce them, to carry them out, and those affected thereby, who claim that the Government officials are acting without authority of law.

But I want to proceed with reference to this particular bill. I agree with what the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DECKER] has said, that some of these matters ought to be left for our more mature deliberation; but the committee has already put on this resolution a provision for compensation, which is intended, I suppose, to guarantee compensation for the use of the property and not payment for the property itself. Then why not say simply that compensation shall be awarded or given for such use. As it stands this provision seems to me so indefinite that no one can tell what it means. I would like to have some gentleman state whether under the provision with reference to compensation the owner of a telephone line can not say to the Government: "If you take it, I want pay for it in full; I am going to sell it to you."

I do not know why this construction can not be put upon the provision; yet obviously that is not what is intended by the committee or the purpose of the House. Then there is the matter of inserting the provision by way of proviso. Does this mean that the lines can not be taken over until the proviso is complied with? That question is likely to arise. I do not think this ought to have been put in by way of a proviso at all. Notice also the language to be used. If taken literally, payment shall be made for supervision. What kind of an expression is that? Is the owner to pay the Government for supervising his property? One would think so from the language of the resolution, and yet we are asked to rush through a measure of this importance, worded in such a manner that it makes our action really a subject of ridicule.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I will.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Is it not natural to fall into such mistakes when we pass legislation only when O. K'd at the other end of the Avenue? Is not that the situation?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Well, the chief trouble is these measures are brought before us and demand is made that they be rushed through without debate and without ascertaining what the proper form should be.

Mr. DECKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I will.

Mr. DECKER. Does the gentleman have any doubt as to the conciseness of that part of the resolution that gives the grant of power to the President to take over?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. No; I make no question about that.

Mr. DECKER. Then in the wisdom of the committee that was as far as we should go at this time, and I do not think the gentleman ought to blame the committee for not making other provisions when we did not think it was wise to enter into the making of the other provisions at this time.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. If the gentleman will permit, the committee did go further. They put in this proviso in reference to compensation.

Mr. DECKER. That is what the Constitution says. Nobody seriously contends that that is binding, I think—well, it was just a statement—in our judgment, of course, there would be compensation.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. When the gentleman undertakes to put the Constitution of the United States on one of these resolutions, I prefer that he use the wording of that instrument instead of something foreign to it. But why should we reenact the Constitution?

Mr. DECKER. That is the wording of the Constitution.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I am not opposed to the purpose of the resolution. I think there is much more reason for taking over the telephone and telegraph lines than for taking over the railroads. I can see where great economies might be effected by combining the telephone and telegraph systems with the Post Office Department, but I hope that department will be more successful in that direction than the railroad administration. If not, as a matter of economy and service, it will be a sad failure. I realize also that this act may be necessary as a war measure, and am willing to take the President's statement for that, but I would like to have time given so that the proposition could be clearly stated and that we could understand its provisions.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a vote.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. All debate on this amendment is exhausted. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Division, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, who demands a division?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York demands a division.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman should arise in his place.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I rise in my place and demand a division.

The committee again divided; and there were—ayes 86, noes 16.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 5, after the word "President," insert the words "during the continuance of the present war."

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, we accept that.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, then it will be necessary to strike out the succeeding words, "in time of war."

Mr. SIMS. Strike out the words that conflict with this amendment. [Laughter.]

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out of line 5 the words "in time of war."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk is ready to report an amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON]. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 6, after the word "empowered," insert the words "whenever he shall deem it necessary for the national security or defense."

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, we accept that.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I renew my motion to amend line 5 by striking out the words "in time of war." That is in order to make it in harmony with the amendment adopted recently.

Mr. SIMS. Accepted.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, let us understand it. Now, what was the amendment? Where did it come in? Why is it necessary to strike out "in time of war."

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. The House just adopted an amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], "during the continuance of the existing war."

Mr. CANNON. Whereabouts is that?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. After the word "President" in line 5. Of course, if we limited it during the existence of the war it is not necessary to have that phrase "in time of war."

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I sent the wrong copy of my amendment to the desk.

Mr. SIMS. You want to strike out "in time of war," as the words are here in line 5, and it should be as indicated by the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] is exactly right.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota moves to amend, on page 2, line 5, after the word "President" by striking out the words "in time of war."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I do not know what this amendment is, but I desire to limit the time. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania want some time on his amendment?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I think not. It is at the suggestion of Hon. B. L. FAIRCHILD of New York.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania offers the following amendment: Page 2, line 14, after the word "operation" strike out the period, insert a colon, and the following words: "And provided, That any official or employee of the Government who divulges the contents of any message transmitted by telegraph, telephone or cable, or receives for such transmission, to anyone not entitled thereto, shall be decmed guilty of a felony and upon conviction shall be imprisoned for a term of not less than one or more than five years, and shall be fined a sum in the discretion of the court of not more than $10,000."

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against that.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman insist upon the point of order?

Mr. SIMS. Upon the criminal provision for the operation, and we are not dealing with operation.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I really wanted another body to have notice that this amendment had been offered, because it seems to be an important addition to the proposition.

Mr. SIMS. I make the point of order it is not germane to the resolution.

Mr. CANNON. Does the gentleman say this is the law now?

Mr. SIMS. It is in the trading-with-the-enemy act, I understand.

Mr. CANNON. Would that penalty in the trading-with-the-enemy act cover the giving away in time of a heated partisan campaign, where people were absolutely reckless, Republicans, or Democrats, or Socialists, or Prohibitionists, or crazy people, of information to those who would go up and pay so much for the information? Now, is there a penalty in the event of such action? Is there a penalty under existing law without this amendment?

Mr. SIMS. What I said I repeated from a Member on my left, and I myself can not answer. It is a criminal provision and is not in order, and I make the point of order it is not germane to this resolution. And the Chair has already ruled on it. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise——

Mr. CANNON. I do not understand he has ruled on it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would suggest to the gentleman from Tennessee that the amendment be adopted before the committee rises.

Mr. CANNON. What is the amendment?

Mr. SIMS. There are two amendments, one offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH] and the other by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE].

Mr. CANNON. This is the committee amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendment as amended.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be recognized on that motion. I want a very few words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I wish it was not absolutely insisted upon that this legislation should be enacted on the eve of leaving and when there is great desire on the part of all of us to get away from here for a vacation, which seems to be important to many of us. It seems to me that the President now has power under an act approved August 20, 1917, that would render this legislation unnecessary.

Mr. COADY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. COADY. I understand that the Attorney General has ruled that the President has not the power.

Mr. CANNON. I do not know. Suppose I was to deny that he had so ruled, has the gentleman the opinion of the Attorney General?

Mr. COADY. I will say to the gentleman that it was communicated to the committee by some members of the Cabinet that he had so ruled.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, these communications to the committee by word of mouth, not official, not in writing, do not much interest me.

Mr. SIMS. I think I can suggest a fair approach to an answer to the question whether or not the President has the power contained in this resolution, that it was submitted to the Department of Justice and after a thorough investigation and study the Department of Justice reported to the President that he did not have the authority.

Mr. CANNON. Very well. Who wrote the opinion?

Mr. SIMS. As to that I do not know.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman does not know. The gentleman is a lawyer. I think that there are as good lawyers in the House—I am not one of them—as the Attorney General or anyone else employed in that department. I would like to see the opinion, especially when we stop to consider the law. I was going to read it, and I trust I may have the time to read very briefly from the act. I read:

The President in time of war is empowered through the Secretary of War to take possession and assume control of any system or systems of transportation or any part thereof, and to utilize the same to the exclusion, as far as may be necessary, of all other traffic thereon for the transfer or transportation of troops, war material and equipment, and for such other purposes connected with the emergency as may be needful or desirable.

Now, what is it that it is proposed to regulate? The telegraph and telephone lines. They are just as much a part of transportation as the locomotive; every particle as much. You can not run a great railway system without the telephone and the telegraph. Really both are greatly used.

Now, if that be true, and this is a war measure, what is the use of this legislation? I make this point in perfect good faith. I used to try to make a living practicing law on a country circuit over 40 years ago. I never was much of a lawyer, but I had great power to gesture and yell, and I got a lot of verdicts. [Laughter.] I think it does not require much of a lawyer, when you take and read this provision that was enacted in 1916, to say that telegraphs and telephones are a part of transportation and as a war measure can be utilized.

Mr. CHARLES B. SMITH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. I would be very glad to.

Mr. CHARLES B. SMITH. That would undoubtedly be true with lines connected with railroads, but would it be true of commercial lines? For instance, the Western Union and the Postal Telegraph?

Mr. CANNON. Why, the Western Union is utilized by substantially all the railroads in the country and the telephones.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a vote on the substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment as amended.

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the "ayes" seemed to have it.

Mr. CANNON. A division, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is asked for. The question is on the adoption of the committee amendment as amended.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 101, noes 5.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I now move that the committee rise and report the resolution back to the House with the amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to, and that the resolution as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly, the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration House joint resolution 309, had directed him to report the same back to the House with an amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and that the resolution as amended do pass.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, do not the amendments that were agreed to have to be acted upon in the House?

Mr. SIMS. We only amended the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee has answered the parliamentary inquiry of the gentleman.

Mr. SIMS. The previous question was ordered under the rule.

Mr. DENISON. If there is only one amendment, how can we vote on those separately?

The SPEAKER. They were merged in the perfected amendment which the committee reported.

Mr. DENISON. Is there any opportunity in the House to vote on the separate amendments that the committee adopted?

The SPEAKER. No; there is not.

Mr. DENISON. Do I understand the Speaker to say that the Committee of the Whole can adopt a series of amendments here this afternoon and not give the House an opportunity to vote on them?

The SPEAKER. The Chair's understanding of this situation is that the committee reported an amendment or substitute for the original resolution, and that amendment was perfected in the committee, and it winds up by being one amendment, and the House can either vote it up or down.

Mr. DENISON. The House has no privilege of voting on these separate amendments?

The SPEAKER. No; because they have been merged in the general amendment. The chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union reports that that committee, having had under consideration House joint resolution 309, had directed him to report the same back to the House with an amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to, and that the resolution as amended do pass. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the House joint resolution as amended.

The House joint resolution as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Shall the resolution pass?

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the "ayes" seemed to have it.

Mr. GARNER. A division, Mr. Speaker.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 139, noes 5.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I make a point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington makes the point of order that there is no quorum present, and evidently there is not. The Doorkeeper will lock the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll. The question is on the passage of the joint resolution.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 222, nays 4, answered "present" 1, not voting 204, as follows:

By Mr. LEWIS (by request):

A bill (S. 4811) providing for relative rank for and conferring certain authority upon members of the Army Nurse Corps in and about military hospitals, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

On motion of Mr. MARTIN, and by unanimous consent, it was Ordered, That Senator SWANSON be assigned to the chairmanship of the Committee on Naval Affairs, and that he, on his own request, be relieved from further service as chairman (but not from membership) of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

FUNERAL EXPENSES OF THE LATE SENATOR TILLMAN.

Mr. SWANSON (for Mr. SMITH of South Carolina) submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 278), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to pay from the miscellaneous items of the contingent fund of the Senate, the actual and necessary expenses incurred by the committee appointed by the Vice President in arranging for and attending the funeral of the Hon. BENJAMIN R. TILLMAN, late a Senator from the State of South Carolina, upon vouchers to be approved by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

AMENDMENT OF FEDERAL RESERVE ACT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 11283) to amend and reenact sections 4, 11, 16, 19, and 22 of the act approved December 23, 1913, and known as the Federal reserve act, and sections 5208 and 5209, Revised Statutes; and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendment and agree to the conference asked for by the House, the conferees on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the President pro tempore appointed Mr. OWEN, Mr. HITCHCOCK, and Mr. MCLEAN conferees on the part of the Senate.

HOUSE JOINT RESOLUTION REFERRED.

H. J. Res. 309. Joint resolution to authorize the President, in time of war, to supervise or take possession and assume control of any telegraph, telephone, marine cable, or radio system or systems or any part thereof, and to operate the same in such manner as may be needful or desirable for the duration of the war, and to provide just compensation therefor, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

INVESTIGATION OF LIGNITE COALS.

Mr. FLETCHER. I ask that the unfinished business may be proceeded with.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3220) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to make investigations, through the Bureau of Mines, of lignite coals, to determine the practicability of their utilization as a fuel and in producing commercial products.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending question is on the amendment of the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER].

Mr. FLETCHER. The pending amendment is the amendment offered by me to increase the appropriation from $100,000 to $150,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to make investigations, through the Bureau of Mines, of lignite coals and peat to determine the practicability of their utilization as a fuel and in producing commercial products."

CHARTER RATES AND FREIGHT RATES.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, there are two bills on the calendar reported by the Committee on Commerce which are quite important. They were reported unanimously by the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries of the House and passed the House and came to the Senate. There are one or two minor amendments to those bills. I refer to the bill (H. R. 12099) to confer on the President power to prescribe charter rates and freight rates and to requisition vessels, and for other purposes, and the bill (H. R. 12100) to amend the act approved September 7, 1916, entitled "An act to establish a United States Shipping Board for the purpose of encouraging, developing, and creating a naval auxiliary and naval reserve and a merchant marine to meet the requirements of the commerce of the United States with its Territories and possessions and with foreign countries; to regulate carriers by water in the foreign and interstate commerce of the United States, and for other purposes."

These two bills are very much urged by the Shipping Board, and I think they are of very considerable importance, and it is very desirable that they should be acted upon before the recess. I do not believe it will take much time.

Mr. SMOOT. Will the Senator state the calendar numbers?

Mr. FLETCHER. The first is Order of Business 486, House bill 12099. It is unanimously reported by the committee of the House and acted on by the Commerce Committee here and reported. The bill is designed to confer on the President the full powers necessary to enable him to control shipping for war purposes. It furnishes the legislation which, in the judgment of the committee, is necessary to make certain, first, that the depleted tonnage controlled by the United States is able to make its fullest and most effective contribution toward winning the war; and, second, that it will make this contribution at fair and reasonable rates, without that profiteering which has unfortunately characterized some aspects of the shipping business, both before and since the United States entered the war.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. SMOOT. Let the bill be read first.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read.

The Secretary read the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. REED. Mr. President, before it is agreed that the bill shall be considered by unanimous consent, I desire to make an inquiry of the chairman of the Committee on Commerce. Is it the purpose to have this bill passed this morning?

Mr. FLETCHER. That is the purpose.

Mr. REED. Is there any reason why the bill can not lie over until after the recess?

Mr. FLETCHER. The only reason for its passage at this time is that the Shipping Board has been urging the legislation for some time. The bill has been before the committees of both Houses and has been thoroughly considered by them. It seems to be quite important that this authority to the President with regard to extending the requisitioning power and also with regard to the fixing of rates should be immediately granted. The lack of such power is creating some embarrassment.

Mr. REED. Is the bill reported with amendments?

Mr. FLETCHER. It is reported with only three slight amendments, which I am sure will not be disagreed to by the other House.

Mr. REED. Does the Senator think he can get the bill through to-day?

Mr. FLETCHER. I think so. I am quite sure the other House will be willing to agree to the amendments, which provide for extending the time for the operation of the proposed act to 18 monthhs after the war. That is necessary, because it is perfectly plain that at the close of the war we may have millions of men in Europe and that we can not get them out in six months. It would be impossible to do it. That is the reason why the committee thought the time ought to be extended to 18 months.

Mr. REED. I am not going to object to the consideration of the bill, but I think it very unfortunate that it should be brought up at this time, when it can have no consideration upon the floor. While I am a member of the committee, and it may be said I ought to have been present when it was considered, yet I have been serving on other committees continuously, and I can not be in two places at the same time. That is my excuse for unfamiliarity with the bill, but just as I glance through the bill hastily I find section 16, which, as is usual these days, provides nothing but the penitentiary for any man who does not absolutely comply with a rule or a regulation.

We have been passing bill after bill relating to matters which are not in their nature criminal at all, and we have been providing that any violation of a measure which is purely a civil regulation shall be punished by imprisonment in the penitentiary. It is very unwise legislation; it is hysterical legislation; and some of it, I unhesitatingly say, is idiotic legislation.

I find a clause of this kind in the bill, and yet the committee has written an amendment to the bill providing that if any clause in the bill is found to be unconstitutional the rest of the bill shall not be rendered void by reason of the unconstitutionality of that part of the act which is condemned.

Mr. FLETCHER. That is not a committee amendment.

Mr. REED. That is in the original bill. It was put in there by the man who drafted the bill, by somebody in the Department of Justice, who knew that he was sheering the edge of the Constitution so closely that he was very likely to be in unconstitutional territory. A bill of that doubtful character is brought forward, and citizens of a free Republic are told that if they dare even to test out any of its provisions they shall do so only by jeopardizing their liberty and possibly by getting themselves into the penitentiary. It is the kind of provision that you ought to expect to find in the regulations of despotism, but not in the laws of a free country. Similar provisions, however, have repeatedly been put into the legislation we have been passing. I want at least the privilege of protesting against this character of legislation. How far it will go in its construction no man can tell.

I picked up a paper this morning and found a paragraph which, if I can lay my hands on it, I will read:

CAR THEFTS SABOTAGE—THIEVES FACE 30 YEARS IN PRISON NOW, ADMINISTRATION ANNOUNCES.

In its nation-wide campaign to put an end to thefts from railroad cars the Railroad Administration property-protection section is determined to invoke the new sabotage law with its drastic penalties. Arrests were made at Boston Saturday in connection with the theft of material. The district attorney there has been asked to have these men indicted under the new law, which provides a penalty of 30 years imprisonment.

That is from the Washington Post of July 3.

Mr. President, when we adopted the law providing penalties for sabotage there was not a man in this Congress, there was not a lawyer upon a committee, who had the slightest idea that it would be employed for the purpose of punishing a petty-larceny thief who stole a watermelon from a freight car. Nobody dreamed of that; but you can trust any of the gentlemen charged with the enforcement of a law to find new uses and purposes for the law; you can trust anybody connected with the executive department searching for some means to carry out their will and purpose to find the most drastic provisions of the law and apply them.

Of course a petty-larceny thief ought to be punished for stealing, but he ought to be punished according to the ordinary law of the land. If he is a small offender, he ought not to be sent to the penitentiary for 30 years. The stealing from freight cars is no worse than it has always been. There has always been a condition where people will filch from a freight car. There have always been a lot of old women who go out and pick up coal along the tracks. There has been an occasional fellow, of whatever complexion, who, seeing a carload of watermelons, will roll one off down into the ditch and get away with it; but, of course, some little district attorney would like to add a large-sized scalp to his belt and say, "I sent another man to the penitentiary for 30 years." Now, it is our business to go a little carefully with these things.

I want to call attention to section 16:

That whoever does or attempts to do anything in this act declared to be unlawful—or willfully violates any rule, regulation, or order issued under authority conferred herein, shall be punished by a fine of not more than $5,000 or by imprisonment for not more than two years, or both.

Who is going to administer this law? The President? No. The President not only will not administer it, but he can not, in the very nature of things, know very much about its administration. He will have to find somebody to administer it. He may desire to turn it over to Dr. Garfield. Now, just think of sending a man to the penitentiary for two years for not obeying a rule or order of Dr. Garfield's! He may find somebody worse than Dr. Garfield. Entertaining, as I do, the very highest opinion of Dr. Garfield, I think it quite possible that he can not find his equal anywhere. I am not willing to send any man to the penitentiary for failing to obey a rule that any man has made. I am only willing to send to the penitentiary men who violate the law of the land and not the rules and regulations of individuals.

If this bill comes on for consideration, I am going to insist upon modifying section 16; but I will not object to its coming on for consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Commerce, with amendments.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I suppose the Senator having the bill in charge will admit that the powers conferred under the bill are as broad and extensive as language can grant. I listened to what the Senator had to say in relation to the amendment extending the time from six months, as provided for in the House bill, to 18 months, as provided by the Senate amendment; and the Senator gave as a reason why the time should be extended that at the close of the war it will be a physical impossibility to get our men and supplies transported from France to the United States within six months.

Mr. President, that is nothing more nor less than an invitation to England and to France to refuse assistance to the United States in transporting her troops and supplies now in France to the United States after the close of the war. If ships of the United States are to transport all of our Army and supplies from France to America after the close of the war it simply means that the English ships and the ships of our other allies will be free to engage in the commerce of the world and secure control of commerce because of shipping facilities while our boats are engaged in transporting the American troops from France to the United States. Think of the advantage it will be to foreign countries by having 18 months with little competition in which to secure trade relations with all parts of the world, and control the carrying trade from those countries.

Mr. President, I believe we ought to have an understanding that as England and France have assisted the United States in the transportation of our troops and supplies to France, so at the close of the war they ought to assist the United States in returning them to America. I think the House was right in limiting this power to six months after the close of the war, and that it should not be extended to 18 months; and I have enough faith in our allies to believe that if they are asked to assist in the transportation of our troops back to the shores of America at the close of the war, they will do so, and then we can all start upon an equal basis as to the control of the commerce of the world.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, the Senator will note that this is only a provision that if, in the judgment of the President, the tonnage shortage at such time is so severe that national interests of the United States are jeopardized, he may, by proclamation, extend it to 18 months. Now, if that power is extended to 18 months, surely we are in no worse fix than we would be if it were limited to six months. If it is not needed the President will not authorize it. We can safely count on such assistance as we can get, of course, from those associated with us; but suppose they are unable to do the things that are necessary to be done? Then we have the power to extend all the authority given here for a little longer time.

Mr. SMOOT. What the Senator says would be all right if we had the power to control the ships of England and the ships of France and our other allies, but we have not; and therefore what I have said will no doubt happen. I believe that if we limited the period to six months the President of the United States could say to France and England and our other allies: "You must assist us in the transportation of our troops from France to America, for they must be transferred within the shortest possible time, as the power granted me to control the American ships lapses at the end of that period."

Mr. FLETCHER. I have no doubt that will be done, but suppose they did not. We do not want to be helpless in that situation.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I do not think we are going to be helpless as far as shipping is concerned, for we are building millions of tons of shipping, and if England, France, and Italy refuse, I believe that the shipping interests of our country will be large enough and our private shipowners loyal enough to see that our soldiers are not left on foreign soil for 18 months after the close of the war. We want them here in six months, or less time if possible, and I believe it can be done; and I think every action of Congress should be to that end, and have it understood that at the close of the war our soldiers will be back on American soil within six months at least, and not give an intimation that it will require 18 months. Do not send word to our soldiers that many of them will be required to remain abroad for 18 months after the war is over.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, would the Senator take from the President or the administrative branch of the Government the right to regulate ocean rates after the war?

Mr. SMOOT. I certainly would take that power from the President six months after the close of the war, and let competition rule, as it always has ruled, in ocean rates.

Mr. POMERENE. And rule as it has during the last two or three years, when they have been charging eleven or twelve hundred per cent of the regular rates?

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator knows why ocean rates have been so increased during the years mentioned by him. War risks and demand were the causes.

Mr. POMERENE. I know that we have suffered from nothing so much as we have from those rates.

Mr. SMOOT. That is not the question under discussion.

Mr. POMERENE. That is one of them.

Mr. SMOOT. Nobody is objecting to the regulation of the rates while the war is on. That is not involved in any question raised in opposition to the measure.

Mr. FLETCHER. Those are some of the powers that are granted in this bill, that are extended if the President finds it necessary to extend them.

Mr. SMOOT. The whole of them may be extended for 18 months if the Senate amendment is adopted. I will say there is no necessity for it, and I think the amendment is an unwise one, and the House provision ought to stand. I sincerely trust that the Senator from Missouri will offer his suggested amendment to section 16, for I think it is unwise and ought to be amended.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, if I may ask for information, since this question has been discussed by the Senator from Utah, my memory is that by other legislation the Shipping Board was given the power to control rate fixing. Is that true?

Mr. FLETCHER. Only as to coastwise business. This is the trans-Atlantic over-sea business.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Florida is correct in saying that the authorization to the Shipping Board under existing law is confined to coastwise trade alone. This goes further than that. This grants to the President the power to control all shipping that may enter the United States or go from the United States.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, so far as these war powers are concerned, I want to make my position on the subject perfectly clear. I do not like to see this continue too long after the war; but, at the same time, in my judgment this Government ought to control these trans-Atlantic rates, so far, at least, as the charges by our own vessels are concerned.

Mr. SMOOT. After the war those rates will be controlled by competition with ships from other countries; and I take it for granted that the Senator from Ohio will admit that before the breaking out of the war the ocean rates were exceedingly low. I might add that they were so low that we had hardly any shipping upon the ocean, because we could not meet the competition of foreign countries.

Mr. POMERENE. That is, they were low to foreigners and higher so far as our commerce was concerned; and we were constantly suffering from that fact.

Mr. SMOOT. I think the rates to the United States were so low that it was impossible for Americans to operate ships for American foreign commerce. That is understood, and that is why we had no merchant marine before the breaking out of the war.

Mr. FLETCHER. I want to say that there was not a ship line that was not making over 30 per cent on the capital invested. They were making plenty of money.

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator say there was not a ship line that was not making 30 per cent before the declaration of war?

Mr. FLETCHER. Before the war there was not one of them that was not making 30 per cent and over.

Mr. SMOOT. Before the declaration of war between England and Germany?

Mr. FLETCHER. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. I think the Senator is utterly mistaken there. I do not think there is a doubt about that. I take it for granted that the Senator means American lines as well.

Mr. FLETCHER. Whatever we had.

Mr. SMOOT. I will admit that we did not have any to speak of, but those that we did have did not make 30 per cent.

That is all I desire to say about the bill. With those amendments, if they could be made, I see no reason why the bill should not pass, although I want to say to the Senator from Ohio that the President will not exercise the powers granted in this bill. They will be conferred upon some individual, and that individual will regulate the rates, and if this bill passes as it now stands, he will have the power to make rules and regulations that may be burdensome upon those engaged in shipping; and remember that under section 16 of this bill, if a rule or a regulation is violated, the person who violates it can be sent to the penitentiary for two years and fined the sum of $5,000.

TELEGRAPH AND TELEPHONE CONTROL.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I dislike to interrupt the proceedings, but what I am about to say is along this line:

I find that in 1866 Congress passed a bill authorizing the Government to take over the telegraph lines, and I find, in reading the treaties by James B. Wright involving the construction of this act, that section 3 of the act itself authorized the Government, at any time after five years from the construction of these telegraph lines, to take them over. In order that it may be understood and that each Senator may have a copy of the act, because it is going to be very important, I ask that the act itself may be printed as a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The act referred to is as follows:

An act to aid the construction of telegraph lines and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes.

"Be it enacted, etc., That any telegraph company now organized, or which may hereafter be organized, under the laws of any State in this Union shall have the right to construct, maintain, and operate lines of telegraph through and over any portion of the public domain of the United States and along any of the military or post roads of the United States which have been or may hereafter be declared such by act of Congress, and over, under, or across the navigable streams or waters of the United States: Provided, That such lines of telegraph shall be so constructed and maintained as not to obstruct the navigation of such streams and waters or interfere with the ordinary travel on such military or post roads (railroads). And any of such companies shall have the right to take and use from such public lands the necessary stone, timber, and other materials for its posts, piers, stations, and other needful uses in the construction, maintenance, and operation of said lines of telegraph, and may preempt and use such portion of the unoccupied public lands subject to preemption through which its said lines of telegraph may be located as may be necessary for its stations, not exceeding 40 acres for each station, but such stations shall not be within 15 miles of each other.

"SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That telegraph communications between the several departments of the Government of the United States and their officers and agents shall, in their transmission over the lines of any of said companies, have priority over all other business and shall be sent at rates to be annually fixed by the Postmaster General.

"SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the rights and privileges hereby granted shall not be transferred by any company acting under this act to any other corporation, association, or person: Provided, however, That the United States may at any time after the expiration of five years from the date of the passage of this act, for postal, military, or other purposes, purchase all the telegraph lines, property, and effects of any or all of said companies at any appraised value, to be ascertained by five competent, disinterested persons, two of whom shall be selected by the Postmaster General of the United States, two by the company interested, and one by the four so previously selected.

"SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That before any telegraph company shall exercise any of the powers or privileges conferred by this act such company shall file their written acceptance with the Postmaster General of the restrictions and obligations required by this act.

"Approved, July 24, 1866."

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, being wholly in harmony with the view of the Senator from North Carolina, and understanding that act, I tender a bill for the creation of a department of transportation and telegraph and the creation of a Cabinet Member, a secretary of transportation and telegraph, for the administering of railroad transportation and telegraphs. I ask to have the bill referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce, and I thank the Senate for permitting the interruption.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the bill will be received and so referred.

By Mr. LEWIS:

A bill (S. 4806) to create a department of Government to be known as the department of transportation and telegraph, with a member of the Cabinet, to be known as the secretary of transportation and telegraph, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, in view of what was just stated by the Senator from North Carolina, and the fact that he has referred to the bill that was passed in the days of President Lincoln, I want to say that there is absolutely no analogy between the situation then and the situation now. At that time the war was upon our own shores.

Mr. OVERMAN. No, Mr. President; the act was passed in 1866, after the proclamation of peace.

Mr. KING. I was in error as to the date; but I remember that prior to the termination of the war an act was passed for the purpose of taking over the railroads, and that act also, or one passed substantially about the same time, provided for taking over the telegraph lines.

Mr. OVERMAN. It was in 1866.

Mr. KING. But there was one prior to that. What I wanted to say was that conditions which might have warranted the taking over the telegraph lines and the telephone lines, if they had existed then, find no parallel now, because the situation physically is entirely different from what it was at that time. By that I mean that the railroads and telegraph lines authorized to be taken over during the Civil War were found generally in border States. The Government in opposition to the Nation was at our door, if not in our midst. Our foes are 3,000 miles away and can not affect our railroads or telegraph lines. But in making this statement I do not mean to express an opinion as to whether it is now necessary and proper for the Government to take over the telegraph and telephone lines.

Mr. OVERMAN. I only introduce it, I will say to the Senator, because I suppose this question will come up and there are certain rights and privileges in that act that ought to be taken care of in the new legislation suggested. That was my purpose in putting it in the RECORD, because it is very important that the guaranties and reservations under the act shall be taken care of.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I beg the indulgence of the Senate to the extent of making clear my position. I did not expect to allude to it even until later in the day. I have been one of those who have been insistent that it was not necessary to pass here in the Senate a measure granting to the President the authority to take the lines of telegraph over by specific legislation. I have been urging that if there are any conditions that would justify the President of the United States as Commander in Chief to take over the telegraph companies he had that right by the proclamation of war, and he has it by virtue of this act, and he has it by virtue of the general authority. The question turns on what conditions exist to justify the taking of the property, and of that the President of the United States is the judge. I merely allude to it at this time as a justification for my position heretofore expressed that there was no necessity for us to pass any legislation to authorize the President to take possession of these properties if in his judgment the conditions justify it.

I tendered the bill creating a department of transportation and telegraph and the creation of a Cabinet member for that purpose, that there might be a department that could administer that, severed from the duties that are now imposed upon the department heads already overcrowded, and to an extent, as I see it, that seriously embarrasses them in the discharge of their duties because of the exhaustion of their physical capacity. It was because of the views I hold that we did not need legislation, that it was now in the power of the President, if conditions justify it, to take possession of the property and administer it, that I tendered the measure this morning, and I trust the act tendered by the eminent Senator from North Carolina justifies the proceedings if the President should take the step. I desire to make no further statement at this time.

Mr. BORAH. I wish to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. LEWIS. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. I observe in this morning's report that the House has passed joint resolution 309, and also announced immediately after the passage of the joint resolution that it was ready to recess. Is it the understanding of the Senator from Illinois that we are to take a recess without disposing of that joint resolution?

Mr. LEWIS. I will say to the Senator I do not know what the understanding of other Senators is. For myself, I am free to say to him that I have this morning expressed the view that it was not necessary for us to pass that joint resolution in order to give the President the authority, and while I felt the House in passing it, Members, coming from all over the country, gave their approval to the act of the President, there was sufficient legal authority already in existence which rendered it unnecessary for us to remain, and we could take the recess without passing the act and without in any wise diminishing the authority of the President to do everything the House resolution authorizes. Such is my view.

Mr. BORAH. The President evidently desires the authority, and at least I think the Senator from Illinois will agree with me that we ought to determine whether or not it is necessary to pass it, and if it is necessary to pass it, to pass it, and if it is not, take a recess for that reason and not leave the matter upon our lap undisposed of. The subject matter ought to be disposed of before the recess.

Mr. LEWIS. In other words, Mr. President, I take it the Senator from Idaho is of the judgment that we should make some expression that it is either unnecessary to pass the joint resolution because of present authority which we think exists, or, if necessary to pass the joint resolution, we should stay here and press it and not recess.

Mr. BORAH. Precisely.

Mr. LEWIS. Upon that I may say there may be something said later on both sides of the Chamber, and Chairman MARTIN, who is not now present, probably will make some expression on the subject. I will go no further than state my personal views, which I have heretofore expressed.

Mr. BORAH. I see that the Senator from Virginia is present.

Mr. LEWIS. I did not observe him.

Mr. BORAH. He has just come into the Chamber. We would like to know something about this program to take a recess. There seems to be a most extraordinary display of secret diplomacy. If we are going to have a recess and leave these matters undisposed of, it is a matter of which some of us would like to be informed. There seems to be a disposition to have a recess and leave a number of matters undisposed of. If that is the program I should like to know why it is. The House has passed this joint resolution. It has discharged its duty. It has relieved itself of the responsibility. It has sent it here, and it will leave it with the Senate, and if the Senate recesses without disposing of it and any extraordinary or exigent situation arises we are to carry the blame. So far as I am concerned, I do not propose to join in that program.

Mr. MARTIN. Referring to the inquiry which I understand has been made about the joint resolution taking over the telegraph and telephone companies, I will say that I made quite considerable inquiry of Senators on both sides of the Chamber as to the expediency of passing the joint resolution at an early date. The practically unanimous opinion expressed to me was that it was an exceedingly important proposition; that it would go to the Committee on Interstate Commerce; and that there would be hearings and careful investigation and it would take considerable time, and if we were going to take any recess it would be impossible to get consideration of that resolution before the recess. I think the expression of that opinion was universal. I do not know how many Senators I talked to about it, but quite a large number, and it is a view in which I certainly concur fully.

I think it ought to be investigated, and I think the Senate and the country ought to know the reasons which require the taking over of these large properties.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I thoroughly agree with the Senator from Virginia that it is a very important matter, and that it ought to be thoroughly investigated and considered before it is disposed of. But I do not think it is a proper procedure to have the House pass an important measure of that kind under an exigent situation because it seemed to be proceeding upon the theory that it was absolutely necessary to proceed and proceed in haste and then send it to the Senate, and at the same time practically send a resolution here for a recess.

Mr. MARTIN. That is a view in which I do not concur. I do not know of any urgent necessity for hasty action on this important matter. Not a single fact has been given, not a single argument has been made, not a single suggestion has come to me showing there is occasion for extraordinary haste in so important a matter. My judgment is—and I believe it is the judgment of the Senate—that it should go to the Committee on Interstate Commerce and hearings should be had, and a careful investigation made before it is taken up for consideration in the Senate.

Mr. BORAH. It has been made a matter of record, nevertheless, that the House practically unanimously passed the joint resolution, and certainly passed the joint resolution upon the theory that it was necessary to pass it before the recess. The House would not have passed the resolution without any debate or without any consideration practically unless the House felt that the situation was exigent. It has passed it and sent it here to the Senate, and we are going supposedly to take a recess.

Mr. MARTIN. The House frequently shifts the responsibility upon the Senate. They expected the Senate to investigate it. They are in the habit of passing a measure in a shape which they would not do if they did not know that the Senate would investigate it before it was finally passed.

Mr. BORAH. That is precisely what I want to do, but I want to know if it is the program that we are to take a recess and leave this important legislation suspended here between the two Houses?

Mr. MARTIN. I know of no other program except that of the two bodies. My belief is that an overwhelming majority of both Houses contemplate a recess and hope it may come to-night. They do not expect to consider that matter before the recess. No one is authorized to make a program, but the consensus of opinion, as far as I have been able to gather on both sides of the Chamber and in the House, is that the Senate and House ought to have some rest and relaxation from labor now and take a recess. It was stated on the floor that a resolution would be sent here providing for a recess until the 12th day of August, and I believe that is the purpose of the two Houses. Nobody is authorized to fix the program——

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I do not think the action of the House in passing the joint resolution is an expression of opinion in the House that the matter is so urgent that it should be acted upon immediately. On the contrary, I think taking the circumstances under which the House has acted, it is rather an expression which negatives that idea, because the House acted with full knowledge of its purpose, in which it asked, as far as an individual and private expression could ask, the consent of the Senate for a recess this afternoon. The House knew perfectly well that this matter ought to be investigated. The House passed the joint resolution and sent it over here with the expectation that we would take a recess this afternoon. The House expected the Senate to make that investigation and the House knew it could not make it to-day. Therefore the action of the House does not indicate that it was the expression of opinion on the part of the House that there ought to be immediate action.

Mr. NORRIS and Mr. BORAH addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator from North Carolina yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska, who rose first.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to inquire of the Senator if he expects the Committee on Interstate Commerce, to which I presume the joint resolution will be referred, to remain here during the recess and make that investigation?

Mr. SIMMONS. I will say that I expect it not to remain here the whole of the time. I would expect them to begin their investigation on this matter some time before the reassembling of the two Houses.

Mr. NORRIS. How long does the Senator think it will take to investigate it?

Mr. SIMMONS. I have no more means of knowing how long it will take than the Senator himself has.

Mr. NORRIS. I am trying to get information.

Mr. SIMMONS. It is an exceedingly important question.

Mr. NORRIS. I agree with the Senator on that proposition.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not think it ought to be acted on hurriedly. I am quite confident the House would not have acted on it so hastily if it had not expected a full investigation. As to the time it will require to investigate a question of this character I am not able to answer.

Mr. NORRIS. Let me ask the Senator, further, does he not think, inasmuch as the request comes from the executive department, that, in view of the exigency, whatever it may be that has made it in the judgment of the President necessary to pass this law would take more than a very few days for the committee to ascertain whether those conditions were such as to warrant this kind of legislation? If that be true, why should we couple that up always with a recess? Why should not that investigation be made within a few days and be passed upon by the Senate without taking a recess?

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not know of any authority for the statement which the Senator has made that the President is urging the two Houses of Congress to take immediate action upon this question. I have seen it stated in the newspapers that certain Cabinet ministers had appeared before the committee in support of this legislation——

Mr. BORAH. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. SIMMONS. And that they had expressed possibly the opinion there ought to be early action in that behalf. But I am not in the possession of any information, I have not seen anyone who is in possession of any information, that the President of the United States thought this was a matter of such pressing urgency that a recess should be delayed.

Mr. LEWIS. If the Senator will allow me, I can probably aid him in his exposition. I will say to the Senator from North Carolina and those who are here we have reason to understand the only expression of the President as far as the Senate is concerned was an inquiry as to whether it was practicable for us to pass the joint resolution.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is true. I think it may be said without violation of any propriety that the question of a recess of Congress about this time has been discussed by Members of this body, and, Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. May I call the Senator's attention to a statement in the RECORD of yesterday's proceedings?

Mr. SIMMONS. Very well.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. POU, of the House, said:

> I said that, after conferring with the President, Mr. Tumulty called me over the phone and stated that the President felt that it was very necessary that this resolution should be acted upon at as early a date as possible.
> Mr. KITCHIN and myself were discussing the advisability of presenting this rule to-day, and he and I decided that it was desirable, in view of the fact that the recess had been so much talked about, to get direct information; and at his suggestion I went to the phone and in his name as well as my own submitted the inquiry whether the President deemed it necessary that this resolution should be acted upon before adjournment, and, as I stated, the answer came back in the affirmative.

Mr. President, the thing I am interested in is to know whether there has been any change in view upon the part of those who originally thought it was necessary to initiate this legislation. It was initiated for the purposes, I understand, of taking care of the strike situation. If that strike situation has been adjusted and is out of the way, and there is no occasion for this, a different situation presents itself entirely; but if the situation is the same, if the conditions are the same, as the House has passed it by a practically unanimous vote under the statement that the President thought it was necessary before a recess, I am not willing myself to vote for a recess until I understand either that the executive department has changed its mind entirely with reference to the necessity or until we dispose of it. If we shall determine that it is unnecessary or unwise to pass it, very well, but let us dispose of it.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. Being a member of the committee to which the joint resolution will probably go, in fact as the joint resolution offered by the Senator from Texas has already gone to that committee, I think I may be permitted to say this: I have some familiarity with legislation of this character. The subject is vastly more difficult and more complicated, especially so far as it concerns the telephone companies, than with the subject of the operation of railroads.

It will be, in my opinion, no short job to compose the legislation which is necessary to take over these properties. I do not want it to happen again, as it has happened with the railroad companies, that immediately after their occupation or possession by the Government we experience an increase of anywhere from 25 to 300 per cent in the rates. When we take over the telephones of the country—and I suppose there are 20,000 or 30,000 companies—and take over the telegraph companies, I think it is manifest we ought to take them over under such conditions as will protect the people of this country against unjust rates. I am sure it will require two or three weeks of investigations and hearings before we are ready to report a bill. Then it will require time, of which the Senator can judge as well as I, to consider and pass the bill.

It is entirely immaterial to me whether we have a vacation or not; that does not enter into my inquiry; but I think that I will be confirmed by my associate members of the committee when I say that this subject is one which can not be and will not be disposed of in a moment, nor do I think that any Senator here wants it disposed of in that way.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Iowa is accurate in the statement that he has made as to the probable time it will take to draft and to pass this legislation through the Senate. I agree with him in the statement that it is a complicated question and one of importance very nearly equal to that of the railroad legislation which we have recently passed. The Members of this body know how long it took to pass that measure through the Senate and how long it took the committee to consider and to frame the legislation. I think that if this legislation is to be passed before we take a recess, we had just as well abandon once for all any purpose of taking a recess. I have no doubt it will take, probably, not so long as the Senator indicated, but I have no doubt it will take three or four weeks to consummate the legislation even if the committee should begin consideration of the subject immediately.

Mr. President, so far as the statement made by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] is concerned, I was advised as to the conversation of Representative POU over the telephone with Mr. Tumulty. I do not think what happened at all militates against the position which I formerly stated. My understanding is that Mr. POU communicated with the President through Mr. Tumulty; that he ascertained, through Mr. Tumulty, that the President was anxious that this legislation should be speedily enacted; but there was no indication that the President thought that the legislation was so urgent that we should forego a recess at this time on account of it.

The President, in the conference to which I alluded a little while ago, expressed to the Senators who were present—I was one of the two Senators, and Mr. KITCHIN was also present—a very earnest desire that there should be water-power legislation; but after we had discussed that matter he thought that it could be passed after the recess, and thought there was nothing in the situation which required Congress to be kept here against its will for the purpose of passing such legislation.

I do not think there is anything in the suggestion of the Senator that this legislation is necessary in order to avoid a strike. It has been discussed to some extent in the newspapers that such legislation possibly might have some effect upon the strike, but I do not understand that that is the ground upon which the administration desires the legislation. I do not understand it is definitely determined that there will be any strike whether there is legislation or whether there is not legislation. That has simply been thrown in as a sort of ancillary reason why there should be action at this time.

Mr. President, the President of the United States knows perfectly well—in fact it has been impressed upon him, I am quite sure—that if he should ask the Senate in direct terms to pass this proposed legislation as a matter of public urgency before the recess, the Senate would forego any desire it might have to take a recess in order to do that.

Mr. BORAH. I have no doubt about that.

Mr. SIMMONS. The President, however, has had an opportunity to make such an expression to the Senate, and he has not made it. On the contrary, instead of making such a request of the Senate the President has merely communicated with the leader on this side of the Chamber—and I think the time has come when we ought to state the facts—and he did it after the action of the other House, making an inquiry as to whether it would be possible to pass such legislation before the recess.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, it seems the only way we can ascertain what the President's views are on this matter is to inquire here upon the floor of the Senate.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think it is entirely proper for the Senator from Idaho to inquire.

Mr. BORAH. I simply desire to know the true situation.

Mr. SIMMONS. And I think the Senator is entitled to a very frank answer from this side of the Chamber, upon whom the responsibility in the last analysis rests.

I want to say to the Senator, while I am not authorized to disclose the nature of the President's communication to the leader of this body, that communication does not request action. It simply makes an inquiry as to the situation in the Senate with reference to a recess.

Mr. BORAH. Does the Senator from North Carolina communicate to this body the fact that the President no longer thinks it necessary to act upon this legislation prior to a recess?

Mr. SIMMONS. I can not state what the Senator asks me to state categorically. I can only say that the President undoubtedly is advised of the fact that this body stands ready if he demands legislation of this sort before a recess to comply with his request, and with full knowledge of that situation the President has not asked us to do it.

Mr. BORAH. I am glad to know one fact, and that is that the strike situation has been eliminated; that it is no longer by reason of the threatened strike that we propose to take over this property. That presents, however, an even more difficult proposition and a more important proposition, because that foreshadows the fact that we are taking the first step toward permanent ownership and control of the telegraph lines. If there is no occasion by reason of the strike situation for this movement, if that was simply an incident, then there must be underlying the movement, step by step, the proposition to take over the telegraph companies and the telephone companies as a permanent policy. That is extremely important, and I am very much obliged to the Senator for revealing that fact to the Senate and to the country.

Mr. President, the Postmaster General, Mr. Burleson, sent a communication to Mr. SIMS, the chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce of the other House, a day or two since in which he said:

MY DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: Answering your inquiry requesting my "opinion as to the desirability and advisability of the immediate passage" of the Aswell joint resolution (H. R. 309) giving the President power, "if in his discretion it is deemed desirable," to assume control of the communicating systems by electricity "in order to insure their continuous operation" during the occasion of war and "to guard the secrecy of military and governmental communications or to prevent communication by spies and other public enemies," I beg to say that such power and discretion to act seems imperative to safeguard public interests.

At this moment the paralysis of a large part of the system of electrical communication is threatened with possible consequences prejudicial to our military preparations and other public activities that might prove serious or disastrous. We are reminded that there is not a nation engaged in the war that intrusts its military or other communications to unofficial agencies.

I deem it, therefore, my duty not merely to approve but to urge the passage of the resolution, in order that the President may act, if necessary, to safeguard the interests of the country during the prosecution of the war.

Respectfully, A. S. BURLESON,
Postmaster General.

The President sent that letter to Mr. SIMS, chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce of the House, accompanied by this statement in the form of a letter:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, 28 June, 1918.

MY DEAR MR. SIMS: Thank you for consulting me about the enclosed. I endorse entirely the enclosed letter from the Postmaster General, which I herewith return, and think that the reasons are stated by him truly and comprehensively.

Cordially and sincerely, yours, WOODROW WILSON.

Hon. THETUS W. SIMS,
House of Representatives.

Mr. President, it is too much to ask Senators, in view of those written declarations, to take a recess until there is a communication of some kind, upon which we have a right to rely, which will relieve us from the odium of taking a recess when a situation of the kind which is foreshadowed in those letters is before us. There is an official communication to the chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce of the House stating that the situation is such as to imperatively demand action; the House has passed the measure practically unanimously under those letters, and it comes to the Senate. Not a word reaches the Senate that the situation is in the slightest degree changed, and we take a recess for six or eight weeks with the Commander in Chief stating in his letter that the situation is imperative for immediate action.

Mr. President, I think that it is fair to the Senate that that communication be modified to show that the situation has entirely changed, and that there is no necessity for action in regard to this matter; otherwise, so far as I am concerned, I shall oppose a recess until it is disposed of.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, while I am a member of the Committee on Interstate Commerce, I have not been in a position to acquire any knowledge concerning this matter, save and except that on yesterday a joint resolution was referred to the committee, and I have been informed that a similar joint resolution was passed by the House of Representatives on yesterday. It has been stated from time to time that one of the reasons for this joint resolution was the possibility of a strike. I have on that subject only such information as I have gleaned from the newspapers. I am very loath to believe that any of the employer class or any of the employee class should so demean themselves during this crucial period in our military history as to bring about such a condition as would interfere with the means of communication within the country. I recognize the fact that there are some men in both classes who would be quite willing to resort to any means to embarrass the Government, but I prefer to believe that there is only a small minority of such individuals in either class.

On yesterday, on my return from South Carolina, I found a telegram on my desk, signed by about 80 telegraphers in the city of Columbus, Ohio, bearing upon this subject. I know of no reason why the situation should be different in Columbus from what I believe it to be in other cities. I am going to send this telegram to the desk. While it was sent to me personally, I believe it will be of interest to Senators generally. I ask that the Secretary read it for the information of the Senate. I do not ask that the names of the signers or any of them be read, for I do not think it necessary, although I have no objection to that being done.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

COLUMBUS, OHIO, July 4, 1918.

Hon. ATLEE POMERENE,
Senate Chamber, Washington, D. C.:

The undersigned, loyal and patriotic employees of the Western Union Telegraph Co., of Columbus, Ohio, urge you to use your influence against the Government taking over commercial telegraphic communication at the present time. We believe, owing to the very small membership of the Commercial Telegraphers' Union of America, the threatened strike can not materially affect the successful handling of traffic, and that the beneficial arrangements provided by the company for all loyal employees who have given their lives to the service would be sacrificed by the change at this time.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I have had that telegram read, not because I approve or disapprove what is said in the message, for I have no information which would lead me to have a definite opinion one way or the other on this subject. I am in a sort of state of suspended animation; I am willing to be "shown," and I am willing to do anything that may be necessary; but I certainly do feel that in taking a step of this kind I should like to have some information upon which to base action. I am not in the habit of jumping at conclusions without informing myself as to the premises from which those conclusions are to be drawn.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, in common with the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] and the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], I am a member of the committee before which these measures are now pending; and lest there should be a false impression gathered from the views expressed by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], this must be now made clear, that there is no disposition on the part of the Interstate Commerce Committee, I am sure, or of any of the members of that committee on either side of the Chamber, either to shirk the necessity of an investigation or to avoid the obligation of it.

Nor, Mr. President, shall the Senate be left in the position where it may be accused of having fled from the responsibility of taking up the joint resolution passed by the other House. The joint resolution came over from the House, as the eminent Senator from Idaho has correctly pictured, and is now before the committee. Before the Senate would assume to conclude the subject, it naturally would give a hearing to those interested in the properties, to those who own the properties, and also to hear the telegraphers, the employees, as to their rights and their interests, and any other persons in the commercial world or otherwise who feel they have interest sufficient to have a hearing.

The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] has aptly stated, in reply to the Senator from Iowa, that these hearings would, of course, entail a considerable length of time. If we took a recess it would be the Senate taking the recess; and I say to the eminent Senator from Idaho that the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce could still sit.

Mr. GORE. And doubtless would sit.

Mr. LEWIS. And, as the Senator from Oklahoma interjects—for which I express my appreciation—and "doubtless would sit" for the purpose of any investigation that may be necessary.

Mr. President, it is perfectly apparent that any recess which the Senate would take would not interfere with the proper investigation of the subject by the committee. On the other hand, if there be the exigencies which the Senator from Idaho fancied might arise or thought he saw evidence as shown from the RECORD and the reading of papers had arisen, such as a strike that might involve the general instrumentalities of the Government at this crucial hour, I hold that the power is in the President to seize any property necessary for the protection of the Government, particularly lines of communication such as the telegraph, and the country would know from the President and from the proclamation by him at the time of the reasons for his action.

Now, sir, it is evident from the statement of the majority leader, the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN], that the communication which has passed, intended to be for the information of the Senate, in nowise has directed the Senate or suggested to the Senate that there is impending necessity for us to pass this joint resolution before we take a recess; and with the knowledge on the part of the President that the Committee on Interstate Commerce may sit and enter upon any investigations necessary to do justice to all parties, and with the evident knowledge on the part of the President that the resolution has passed the House and is here, and that our purpose is to recess—in the presence of all the premises it is entirely apparent that had he desired that we remain here to pass the joint resolution because of any necessity he felt existed, he would have expressed it; but in the absence of such affirmative expression, it must be seen, sir, that we depart for the recess with the knowledge of the President and with a complete understanding and with a comfortable idea on his part of the circumstances that justify that action.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. LEWIS. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. The President having communicated officially to one branch of the Congress that the situation is such as imperatively to demand action at once, is it not fair to presume that the Congress will not recess until the Congress as a whole shall have discharged its duty?

Mr. LEWIS. I answer the Senator: I would rather gather from that that if the same state of circumstances existed now that existed then, the President would communicate that to the Senate; and the fact that it has not been so communicated to the Senate is an evidence that the circumstances have changed, and the President is wholly justified in not making that request of the Senate at this time.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

Mr. LEWIS. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. KELLOGG. I wish the Senator from Illinois would inform us whether or not it is a fact—it is so reported to be, I believe—that the Attorney General has rendered an opinion that the President has no power now to take over the telegraph and telephone lines; and I wish the Senator would cite to the Senate any statute which gives the President that power.

Mr. LEWIS. I answer the Senator from Minnesota, I am not aware of any opinion that the Attorney General has rendered. I have seen in the newspapers the statement that an opinion has been rendered. I do not know its contents. Second, I say to the Senator it is my opinion, which I trust may meet with respect, if it is not altogether convincing, that the act of 1866, presented by the junior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] and just placed in the RECORD, is sufficient and complete authority for the President to take over the lines without further legislation, if to him there are or shall arise conditions justifying that procedure. Such is my view. I have heretofore given an opinion along that line. I have no reason to withdraw from it.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, Providence and the Weather Bureau by joint action have invited us to remain here until we shall have completed our legislative duties. The weather is salubrious for this time of the almanac and the breezes continue from Chesapeake Bay, and no reason is perceptible to the junior Senator from Illinois why we ought to quit at all until we have completed our labors.

This joint resolution, H. J. Res. 309, which came over by almost unanimous action of the House—only four Representatives being so hardy as to vote against it—is now pending in this body. It may not be as unanimous as it looks when we come to examine it on its merits. It may require more time to investigate the emergency than we anticipate. If we go home for a month or five weeks it will require just about as much time to reach the horsepower of parliamentary endeavor here when we reassemble as it usually does. It will be lost time. We are in a condition where lost motion is much less damaging to us than lost time. The committee that has charge of this matter, or will have charge of it, the Interstate Commerce Committee, ought to investigate, as the Senator from Ohio has suggested, so that we may have some accurate information upon which we may base our action.

I am willing to draw conclusions, but I do wish some of those conclusions to be based upon something that will be fairly accurate with regard to the conditions relating to the telegraph business of this country. There are two principal companies, the Western Union and the Postal Cable. I have not heard from the Postal Cable, but I have a telegram from my constituents in Chicago, signed by 240 of the operatives of the Western Union Co. It is very much like the one read on the request of the Senator from Ohio, but I will send it to the desk and ask that it be read. If any objection be made I will read it myself.

Before the reading is entered upon, let me state that it shows that there is a difference of opinion among the employees themselves that would require, before the committee, a somewhat extended investigation.

I do not think the gentleman who has issued a proclamation that he will tie up all the telegraph service of this country has authority to speak for the employees who are now at the keyboards in the different parts of the Union; neither do I think that there is any of the urgent emergency mentioned in the recitals of this joint resolution; neither do I further think there is, outside of the correspondence that has been incorporated in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD from certain members of the Cabinet and the President, any emergency in the country for action of this kind. I think, therefore, it is a matter that ought to be investigated at some length.

It is no light matter to take over all of the means of electrical communication outside of telephones just upon the letter of a Cabinet member or two. I know very well the controlling motive of the head of the Postal Service in this country in joining with others to cause the telegraphs to be taken over. I only have myself to turn back and read the various annual reports of Mr. Burleson to know that the excuse that he is making here is one that he has been seeking. He is like the Biblical oracle of old. It does not say in that oracle that people offered excuses, but it says in the Holy Writ that they began to make excuses; that is, to manufacture them. That is what they are doing now. Mr. Konenkamp and his associates are always ready to offer some excuse why everything in this country should be taken over by the Government and kept. These excuses, like those of Scriptural days, are made excuses. There have been no important leaks of official governmental or diplomatic matters from the wires in this country, so far as anyone can ascertain. If the Government takes them over, there will be no more obligations for faithful secrecy on the part of the operators or the officers of the companies than there is now. There is, I repeat, Mr. President, if an investigation is had, no urgent emergency requiring these lines to be taken over. That is a matter that the committee ought to act upon, and act as promptly as they can.

This recess, to which I am utterly opposed, will give no time for an investigation between now and the 1st day of September. Another reason why I am opposed to the recess is because we will come back here the 1st of September, say. Members will reassemble. Some of us live at distant points requiring all the way from one to three thousand miles of travel to reach our respective States. By the time this matter is considered on its merits, and an investigation has been had before the committees, and proper hearings have been given to persons who are qualified to give us information on the matters concerned, it will be the 1st day of October. Some of us have to go back home to register. We have registration laws in our country. Without that registration we will lose even the right to vote ourselves. It requires long trips. Other matters of an urgent character, that I need not mention, are coming on swiftly. Therefore this delay caused by a recess will take until at least the 1st day of October, unless we slight the investigation and slight the consideration of such important legislation as may be pending.

The Committee on Finance can go on with their investigation pending the examination of the multifarious questions that will be referred to them for action. That need not interfere with the action of the Senate here. It is only a short way from the room of the Committee on Finance to the Chamber, and in the case of necessary votes they can be present on a roll call.

All the other Members of the Senate not on that committee can go on with the ordinary legislation that is pending here.

I am utterly opposed to any recess at all. No occasion for it occurs to me. On the contrary, we ought to remain here until we have reached the conclusion of our labors, and then adjourn for the session.

I now ask that the telegram which I have sent to the desk may be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KING in the chair). Without objection, the telegram will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

CHICAGO, ILL., July 6, 1918.

Hon. L. Y. SHERMAN,
United States Senator, Washington, D. C.:

The following message has been sent to the President and we would appreciate very much your assistance in maintaining our present status with the Western Union Telegraph Co.: "The undersigned operating employees of the Chicago office of the Western Union Telegraph Co. repudiate the assertions of Mr. Konenkamp that he is acting for us or in any way representing the employees of this company. The C. T. U. A. has no representation whatever in this office, and his statement that he will call 25,000 telegraphers out on strike July 8 is without foundation. The employees of the Western Union Telegraph Co. are with you in the prosecution of this war to a finish, and we refuse to be a party to any obstruction. This sentiment prevails among the telegraph fraternity throughout the entire country. The plans for the formation of an association composed only of Western Union empoyees now under way has our united support. There will be no interruption of telegraph service next Monday if the Western Union employees can have their way. Believe us we are with you to win the war, and we know our services contribute something toward doing so. We repudiate anyone who challenges our loyalty or impugns the honesty of our purpose."

LEROY W. DIXON
(And 239 operating employees of the Chicago office of the Western Union Telegraph Co.).

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President, I might add, as a contribution to the discussion concerning the particular legislation which has been referred to, that I am advised by members of the press now that a statement has just been given out by the President on this subject, in which he has said substantially that he is keenly anxious for this legislation before any recess shall be taken. I know nothing on that subject except the information which has thus been conveyed to me by members of the press.

I am opposed to a recess. I am opposed to a recess, not wholly for the reasons that have been given upon the floor of the Senate this morning, but I am opposed to a recess because the highest duty that can rest upon the Congress of the United States to-day is to stay on the job. [Manifestations of applause in the galleries.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Sergeant at Arms will remove from the galleries those who applauded.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I suggest that the Chair instruct the occupants of the galleries so they will know that there is a different rule in this body than in the other House. Probably the rule was unintentionally and not knowingly violated.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I think, gazing at the galleries and seeing a number of familiar faces, that they are well advised as to the rule. These frequent breaches of the rules of the Senate are not committed by the haphazard visitor, but by the habitué who roosts in the gallery.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the opinion of the Chair.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President, of course, the legislation in reference to the telegraph companies is important legislation. Of course it is inextricably mingled with the particular conflict in which we are engaged. I take it that those who are our commanders at present desire that legislation at the earliest possible moment; but it is upon no such ground that I place my opposition to a recess at this time. With me it is not a question of what the President wants, although I will accord him anything within the bounds of any sort of reason for the prosecution of this war. It is not a question of whether he permits or forbids a recess of this body. The question is, What is the duty of the men charged with the responsibility, of the men who supposedly represent the popular branch of the Government of this country? If there is with those men who represent the supposedly popular branch of the Government an obligation and a duty and a responsibility, then that obligation, that duty, that responsibility, can only be met and can only be satisfied by the body, representing supposedly the popular branch of government, remaining where it is, and remaining to do anything that may arise.

Senators, you doubtless realize as fully as I that impending upon the western front in France to-day is the greatest battle of all the ages. You realize, I am sure, just as I do, that upon that front to-day hangs perhaps the whole issue of this war. You realize, doubtless, as I do, that preparation daily has been made by the Hun on the other side. Any hour now may come the offensive that means the Hun's undoing or that means disaster to a million American boys in France. You understand, I am sure, that the events to-day are portentious, more important, more potential in their possibilities and consequences than any since this war commenced, and they may see consummation in a day or even in an hour of the next few days or the next few weeks.

The answer that has been made to me privately when I have suggested to my colleagues that with this impending cataclysm in France we ought to remain on the job was, "What can we do, and what is it possible for the Senate or the Congress to accomplish?"

I recognize, Senators, that there is perhaps little that we can accomplish. I recognize that we have lost our initiative. I recognize that in a great degree we have become a mere rubber stamp in the Government of the United States. I recognize that we may be only a spur or a deterrent. I recognize all these things, and that possibly in the days to come there is nothing we could do; but possibly in the days to come there may be something we can do, and if there is a possibility at all that we can do anything in these days to come, that possibility we ought to grasp, and we ought to remain where we can act upon that possibility.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President——

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I wish to ask the Senator if it is not a fact that almost every day—at any rate, every week—during the time we have been in session matters have been brought up that we are told it is imperative should be passed?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Certainly; and matters will be brought up in the future. We understand the military condition on the western front. I will not descant upon it, but when I say the crisis is menacing and perilous I am well within the truth. If that be so, then we who have some responsibility yet in this Government should be right here and do our little part.

Mr. President, not only is the particular situation delicate, perilous, and menacing upon the western front, but there is another situation that any day may call for the expression of opinion upon our part, if not for positive governmental action. Russia bleeds to-day. Russia to-day half disorganized, to-day the prey of the Hun, Russia to-day demanding some sort of action upon the part of the entente allies, may at any moment, either by internal crumbling or another cataclysm, require some sort of activity from our Government.

In passing, Mr. President, I wish to express my full commendation of the action of the President of the United States thus far in dealing with that particular situation, and I trust he may be guided in the future by the same wisdom and by exactly the same statesmanship, justified by the knowledge that has come to some of us, and that he shall make no mistakes because of any overwhelming propaganda to the contrary.

In the world theater, therefore, you have your western front where our blood to-day is fighting its fight. You have our western front in which any minute, any hour, may bring the greatest of all the conflicts of all history. You have the East and the situation in Siberia and in Russia daily becoming more delicate and requiring more skillful and tender handling. In this world situation, this world drama, we may not, because the Senate has fallen from its high estate, play the part that we ought to play; but we may play some part, perhaps, after all, and if there is a part at all that we may in the future play in this world drama, let us stay here and play that part.

In closing, in opposition to the recess, Mr. President, again I lay stress upon the fact that it is not what any man wants, it is not what any department desires, it is not what any individual commands, that controls my judgment. I read in the newspaper the other day that the President would permit Congress to recess for a brief period. That is not what governs my attitude here. The controlling factor, the persuasive argument, is there may be a possibility we can render a service in the days to come, days that you and I in all our lives will never again face; and, if there is a possibility of the slightest service, let us stay here on the job.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, following the line of thought pursued by the able Senator from California, I wish to say that in so far as remaining here to do the work which may come before the legislative department of the Government is concerned, I am very much in favor of Congress remaining in session. This view I have entertained and expressed repeatedly upon the floor of the Senate since the declaration of war. If Congress has anything to do with the conduct of the war, Congress ought to remain in session and be ready to meet any emergency that may arise. The framers of the Constitution intended that Congress should play an important part in emergencies like the present. My inclination, of course, is to go home and look after my personal interests, and if a recess shall be taken I shall do that, but if the President of the United States thinks that legislation authorizing him to take over the telephone and telegraph companies ought to be enacted, and if he also feels that the taking over of these companies is exigent and important, there is nothing for the Congress to do but to remain on the job and give the President the power which he says he needs. I do not know that legislation is necessary to authorize him to take them over. It seems to me that his general powers are plenary and ample to meet any emergency. But if there is any doubt about it, however, I am going to resolve the doubt in favor of the continuation of the session. The President is on the watchtower, Congress has delegated to him absolute—almost imperial—powers, and there is nothing for Congress to do now in the matter of conducting the war but to sustain and uphold the hands of the Executive in everything that he demands. That I have done since the declaration of war, and that course I shall pursue to the end of the war.

I hope the taking over of the telephone and telegraph companies to meet an emergency in time of war may be extended for all time and they may be made permanently a governmental function. I have long favored the Government operation, control, and ownership of the telephone and the telegraph under the direction of the Post Office Department. I hope therefore that out of this war emergency a great economic reform may be effected.

With this brief statement of my position I shall vote against taking a recess until all emergency measures are disposed of.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the reading by the Secretary of an article in this morning's Post from the president of the Western Union Telegraph Co.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the article will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

CARLTON SURE WIRE SERVICE WILL GO ON—WOULD YIELD IF HE SAW INTERRUPTION AS POSSIBILITY.

NEW YORK, July 5.

While asserting that he did not wish through any act of his "to add an hour's delay to the Nation's telegraph service," Newcomb Carlton, president of the Western Union Telegraph Co., declared to-night in a statement dealing with the telegraphers' strike scheduled for next Monday, that it is of the "highest importance" that the policy his company has pursued should be continued.

"I do not wish to leave this position with the stigma of having made a great mistake," he said. "I have but one desire, and that is to turn the company over to the Government as it is now—a loyal, efficient, disciplined force of 56,000 men and women, anxious to serve their country and with pride in that service."

He asserted that if the Government failed to take over the wires before Monday he was confident telegraph communication in this country would not be interrupted and that if matters were allowed to go on as they were "the contention which the company has been making as to the unquestioned loyalty of the men and women of the Western Union would be demonstrated beyond a doubt."

He added, however, that if he thought there would be the slightest interruption of service on Monday he would willingly yield for the sake of the Government.

Asserting that the situation was now up to Washington, he expressed the belief that "no outside organization that indulges in strikes should be permitted to have representation among the operators."

EXTENSION OF APPROPRIATIONS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 1 o'clock having arrived, under unanimous-consent agreement the Chair lays before the Senate House joint resolution 311.

The SECRETARY. House joint resolution (H. J. Res. 311) making appropriations for certain necessary operations of the Government and of the District of Columbia for the month of July, 1918, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. BORAH obtained the floor.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. STERLING. Do I understand that the Senator from Idaho desires to speak on the joint resolution?

Mr. BORAH. I only desire to say that I understand the House is now voting, and I would not want the joint resolution to pass until the House finishes its vote. Of course, if it should vote in a certain way one course would be open, and if it votes in another way another course would be open.

Mr. STERLING. I merely want to say that I have the same understanding, and I would suggest that the consideration of the joint resolution be laid aside temporarily.

Mr. BORAH. I understood the chairman of the committee was going to lay it aside temporarily, but he is not now in the Chamber.

Mr. FLETCHER and Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator from Florida first.

Mr. FLETCHER. I was going to suggest that perhaps we could arrange to lay the joint resolution aside and go on with the business which was before the Senate this morning.

Mr. NORRIS. If the Senator will permit me, I had a conversation with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN], who has charge of the joint resolution, and I know it is his intention to lay it aside temporarily until the House can dispose of the conference report. I understand that the roll is now being called in the House, and that within a very short time the result will be known and probably be messaged over here.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If the Senator will permit me, I ask unanimous consent to lay aside——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the Senator from Georgia will pardon the Chair, the Chair invites the attention of the Senate to the unanimous-consent agreement, which reads as follows:

It is agreed by unanimous consent that at 1 o'clock p. m., on the calendar day of Saturday, July 6, 1918, the Senate will proceed to consider H. J. Res. 311, a resolution making appropriations for certain necessary operations of the Government and of the District of Columbia for the month of July, 1918, and for other purposes.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I have just read it. By unanimous consent yesterday we agreed to proceed with the joint resolution to-day, and by unanimous consent to-day we can lay it aside.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not want the Senator from Idaho from what I have said to get the impression that the Senator from Virginia would consent to laying the joint resolution aside permanently. He distinctly said that he would agree to lay it aside temporarily.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It can be called up again.

Mr. NORRIS. I would not want to have advantage taken of him in his absence that would prevent him from calling it up at any time.

Mr. BORAH. That would not prevent it.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not think it would; but he said to me that he would have it laid aside temporarily.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If we abandon the idea of a recess there will be ample opportunity to attend to everything. At any rate, I ask unanimous consent to lay it aside until 3 o'clock.

Mr. McCUMBER. Say 2 o'clock.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I ask unanimous consent that it be temporarily laid aside, and then when the Senator from Virginia comes in he can ask that it be taken up again.

Mr. MARTIN entered the Chamber.

Mr. POMERENE. If that is insisted upon I shall suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. MARTIN. I have no objection to the joint resolution which has come before the Senate at 1 o'clock being temporarily laid aside.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I felt sure of that.

Mr. MARTIN. But it will supplant any business that may be before the Senate at any time when it seems necessary to proceed with the joint resolution. With that understanding, I am willing that it shall be temporarily laid aside without losing its place as the unfinished business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. To be called up by the chairman.

Mr. MARTIN. That is right.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Virginia? The Chair hears none, and the unfinished business is temporarily laid aside to be called up by the Senator from Virginia at his pleasure.

CHARTER RATES AND FREIGHT RATES.

Mr. FLETCHER. I ask unanimous consent to proceed with the consideration of House bill 12099 which was under consideration this morning.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12099) to confer on the President power to prescribe charter rates and freight rates and to requisition vessels, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending question is on the amendment of the Committee on Commerce, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 14, before the word "months," the committee propose to strike out "six" and to insert "not exceeding 18."

Mr. FLETCHER. I ask the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] if it is satisfactory for him to make that 12 months instead of 18 months? I am sure we ought to have a longer time than six months. There is no question in my judgment but what we may need a longer time than six months.

Mr. SMOOT. Then why can not the Senator say nine months? It certainly will not take a longer time than that, even with our own ships.

Mr. FLETCHER. It was the judgment of witnesses before our committee——

Mr. RANSDELL. Will the Senator permit me to read briefly from the testimony of Mr. Henderson, representing the Shipping Board, before the Commerce Committee on that point? It is very brief.

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. Henderson says:

Section 3 provides that the power and authority shall cease on the proclamation of the treaty of peace, but may be extended for a further period of six months if the President considers that the tonnage shortage is sufficiently severe to jeopardize national interests.

We urged before the House committee that the time be extended from 6 months to 18 months. The reasons we advanced were these:

There are at present about 1,000,000 troops in France; we hope that before long there will be 2,000,000. To bring those troops back after the conclusion of the war will require years with the number of troop transports at our service. They must be fed in the meantime. A large part of the munitions and supplies must be brought back. It will take a long time after the end of the war to bring that about. In the treaty of peace we may undertake important obligations in the way of supplying raw materials to European countries which will require the President to control shipping to a certain amount. We feel that the President should know now what powers he will have then, and that Congress at this time, without the necessity for further legislation, should give this extension of power to a period of at least 18 months after the war. That is the time allowed for the railroads, and it seemed to us the same consideration would apply to shipping.

Senator RANSDELL. Do you not think it would take even longer than 18 months to get matters adjusted?

Mr. HENDERSON. It is possible; but by that time Congress will have had ample opportunity to formulate whatever policy regarding shipping it may see fit to adopt. Of course, we do not want now to preclude changes that may be necessary in the future.

Senator RANSDELL. But it certainly does not seem possible now that six months will be sufficient.

Mr. HENDERSON. I do not think so.

The CHAIRMAN. You would suggest 18 months there?

Mr. HENDERSON. Eighteen months.

Now, Mr. President, just a word. I want to say that it seems to us if you give us a sufficient time so that a session of Congress might intervene after the declaration of peace or the signing of the treaty of peace, if a further extension be necessary that would probably cover the case, and it seems to us that a minimum of 12 months would be needed for that. I do not believe our committee would seriously object to changing it from 18 months to 12 months, but certainly it ought to be at least 12 months.

Mr. SMOOT. The whole statement of Mr. Henderson is based upon the fact that 18 months was provided in the case of railroads before returned to owners, but the railroads are entirely different from the shipping operations. There are only a few lines of railroads, and all are organized under the laws of the States. But the shipping interests represent thousands of individuals and corporations, and this not only involves ships owned by citizens of the United States but ships owned by citizens of foreign countries.

Mr. Henderson's statement seems to rest upon the fact that he thinks a few extra months should be given to pass legislation controlling the shipping interests for the future following the close of the war.

Mr. RANSDELL. Will the Senator permit me to call his attention to something? I fear that he was interrupted and did not hear what I read. Mr. Henderson says:

There are at present about 1,000,000 troops in France; we hope that before long there will be 2,000,000. To bring those troops back after the conclusion of the war will take years with the number of troop transports at our service. They must be fed in the meantime. A large part of the munitions and supplies must be brought back.

That part changes the situation very materially and makes it necessary to at least give the President the distinct power to extend this arrangement if he finds it necessary. The provision of the bill, if the Senator will pardon me, does not require him to extend it for 18 months. It says he may extend it not exceeding 18 months.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator is correct in his latter statement. What I want to impress upon the Senate is that we should pass no legislation at this time that would even give England and France or our allies the understanding that we are not going to request of them shipping facilities to bring our soldiers after the close of the war to this country. Mr. Henderson says that the shipping facilities at our command would take at least a year to bring the 2,000,000——

Mr. RANSDELL. He said years.

Mr. SMOOT. That is worse than I thought.

Mr. REED. Who is Mr. Henderson?

Mr. RANSDELL. The representative of the Shipping Board.

Mr. REED. That does not make him wise. What has been his experience? What does he know about it any more than anybody else? The ordinary presumption now is that if you have a plumbing job a professor in chemistry is to be put in the place, or if you have a watchmaker's job a blacksmith is to be employed. So I want to know something about the past of this gentleman?

Mr. RANSDELL. I know nothing about him. He appeared before the Commerce Committee representing the Shipping Board as their accredited representative, and these were his statements, but it does seem as if we got a very large army over there, possibly two and a half million, as we will, we think, have by the 1st of January, and made a desperate drive with all the assistance that we could get from our allies to get those men over there, we certainly can not move any troops back to this country until a treaty of peace has been signed, I imagine. It is bound to take a longer time to get those men and all their supplies and munitions back to this country.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to say to the Senator now——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If the Senator will allow me——

Mr. RANSDELL. The Senator from Utah has the floor. He yielded to me.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I beg pardon.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to say to the Senator that I hope the reading of Mr. Henderson's testimony by him to-day will not be taken by the people of the United States as the policy that will be followed by this Government in getting our troops back to this country. I do not want it to go out to our soldiers in France that after the war closes it is going to take years to transport them back to America.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I wish to call the Senator's attention to the fact that many things in this country will be needed in Europe, and their vessels coming over here will be coming practically empty. I wish to express my intense approval of the Senator's suggestion that no such view should be for a moment tolerated as that we are going to leave our men for 18 months in France, or 12 months. I wish to utterly repudiate the suggestion of this man that we would tolerate such a condition. Every battleship, every vessel of every kind, with the submarines out of the way—vessels of every nation, if necessary, should be employed to bring them back, and I think we ought to resent the suggestion that they would be left there any such length of time.

Mr. SMOOT. I fully agree with the Senator. I think it is a mistake to amend the House provision extending it beyond six months. But to show the Senator that I am not captious in the matter and that I am not doing it simply by the way of criticism, I said, as far as I was concerned, I would yield to nine months; but I think even this would be a mistake.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Vaterland, one vessel, can carry 30,000 troops, it is suggested, or 360,000 can be carried by that one vessel in a year.

Mr. SMOOT. Another thing I want to call the Senator's attention to is that we certainly can not discharge our soldiers while in a foreign country. They have got to be brought to this country before they are discharged from the Army; and to pay a million men over there for a year and a half—when there is no need for their services—the very thought, it seems to me, is indefensible.

Mr. FLETCHER. Of course, the Senator realizes it is not merely a question of men, but a great many supplies and a great many other things will have to be brought back.

It is not only for that purpose that this time ought to be given, but the time ought to be given in order to get these vessels back into the commercial trade. It will take some time to do that and put them in place and get them back in commercial business.

Mr. SMOOT. Just as soon as the war is over, if Germany has any ships at that time or if any other warring country has ships, they are going into the trade immediately. They are not going to be hampered by legislation. I think our shipping industry ought to be in the same condition, and every boat that can be used to carry the commerce of the world ought to enter there just as quickly as possible.

Mr. President, I believe that the President of the United States can ask either England, France, Italy, or any of our allies at the close of our war to assist in transporting the American troops to American soil just as quickly as steam and power can bring them, and I do not believe that one of them will refuse. That being the case, I feel quite sure that six months would be ample.

I know there are supplies to bring as well as troops; but the boats that bring the troops must have something besides troops upon them, and many of the supplies will be used for ballast and to fill the space generally used for the transportation of merchandise of all kinds. I really think that the House provision is a proper length of time.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, just a word. The Senate committee simply wanted to be on the safe side. I do not think any of us have any suspicion that the President will not exercise the power vested in him very carefully. He is the Commander in Chief of our armies and navies in this great war and everything connected with it.

I agree wth the Senator from Utah and the Senator from Georgia that we will bring these troops back just as quickly as possible. It would be a most outrageous thing not to bring them back at once if it could be done, but all practical, common-sense men must admit that if we have an Army of two and a half million soldiers, with all the attachments of the Red Cross, the Young Men's Christian Association, the Knights of Columbus, and hospitals, and everything attached to them, it will be a big job to get all those back. If they can be brought back in three months, the President will not extend the provisions of the law longer than three months. If they can be brought back in six months, the provision will not be extended longer than that. But suppose that unfortunately we can not get them back for 12 months, will not all admit that the provisions of the law ought to be extended for 12 months? There can not be two opinions on that point. There absolutely can not be two opinions on it. We ought to have the discretion vested in the Commander in Chief to extend it that length of time.

I do not wish to be captious, and it is necessary for us to get ahead with this measure. In the period of nine months I imagine Congress would be in session, and there would be an opportunity to amend the law if necessary. Therefore, if the Senator is willing to accept nine months, the committee will accept that. I believe I can speak for the chairman of the committee. The committee will accept it and make it nine months.

Mr. FLETCHER. To facilitate the consideration of the bill, I am willing to agree to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the amendment as modified.

The SECRETARY. In section 3, on page 2, line 14, before the word "months," the Committee on Commerce reports to strike out the word "six" and to insert "not exceeding 18," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 3. That all power and authority hereby vested in the President or by him delegated and all restrictions imposed in this act shall cease upon the proclamation of the final treaty of peace between the United States and the Imperial German Government: Provided, That if, in the judgment of the President, the tonnage shortage at such time is so severe that national interests of the United States are jeopardized, he may, by proclamation, extend the provisions of this act for a further period of not exceeding 18 months.

On page 2, line 14, in the proposed committee amendment, strike out the word "eighteen" after the words "not exceeding" and insert the word "nine."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment reported by the Committee on Commerce as modified.

The amendment as modified was agreed to.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I do not think it very material whether the provision be 6 months or 9 months or 18 months. The compromise arrangement is agreeable to me, but I do want to say that I think it is very unfortunate that there should be any talk here to the effect that it is going to take years to get our boys back from France after the war is over. That is a very discouraging statement to send to the country, and it is a statement, notwithstanding what Mr. Henderson—whoever Mr. Henderson may be—has said, which is not based upon the facts, in my opinion.

To begin with, it is not going to take us years to get 2,000,000 troops there, with the business of carrying all the armament, all the impedimenta that go with an army, and I do not think it would take us so long to get them back if we had not a single additional vessel; but we shall not have to carry this vast burden of cannon, of horses, all the raw materials, and all the inconceivable mass of matter that we have been obliged to take over. We have in a year's time carried over a million men, and we have not only carried them over, but we have raised and organized them. It is well known that in three months we have taken over approximately 600,000 men. If we can do that, I do not see why we can not get them back within the same time.

Moreover, we are now beginning really to produce ships. In one year's time from this date we shall have a fleet of commanding importance, unless by the development of the submarines some new means of activity and destruction shall be devised. If we shall not have such a fleet we shall indeed be in a very bad condition. Of course, the war may end before the year, but the sooner it ends the fewer troops we shall have "over there." My opinion is that the war will last beyond the year, and my opinion also is that within 18 months' time from this hour we shall have the mightiest fleet that ever sailed the seas. Therefore I do not want it stated on the authority of Mr. Henderson or Mr. Thompson or Mr. Jones or Mr. Anybody-else that our troops are going to be taken over there and marooned for years in Europe. I want to make that much of a statement in opposition to the statement of Mr. Henderson.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, the next amendment proposed by the Committee on Commerce to the bill is on page 3.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment reported by the committee will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 3, line 13, after the name "United States," it is proposed to insert "which shall be filed with the United States Shipping Board and open to public inspection," so as to read:

SEC. 6. That the President shall have power to determine, prescribe, and enforce reasonable freight rates and the terms and conditions of affreightment which shall govern the transportation of goods on vessels of the United States, which shall be filed with the United States Shipping Board and open to public inspection.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 16, on page 10, line 18, after the word "both," to insert the following proviso:

Provided, That the district court of the Canal Zone shall have jurisdiction of offenses committed against the provisions of this act within the Canal Zone.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FLETCHER. That completes the committee amendments, Mr. President.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, in section 16 I move to strike out the words "or willfully violates any rule, regulation, or order issued under authority conferred herein."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 10, beginning in line 15, it is proposed to strike out the following words:

or willfully violates any rule, regulation, or order issued under authority conferred herein

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, how would the language read with those words eliminated?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the section as it would stand as proposed to be amended.

The Secretary read as follows:

SEC. 16. That whoever does or attempts to do anything in this act declared to be unlawful shall be punished by a fine of not more than $5,000 or by imprisonment for not more than two years, or both: Provided, That the district court of the Canal Zone shall have jurisdiction of offenses committed against the provisions of this act within the Canal Zone.

Mr. FLETCHER. I think it would be a mistake to adopt that amendment, Mr. President, but I do not care to delay the Senate by a discussion of it particularly. It looks to me as though any willful violation of a rule, regulation, or order ought to be punished as well as anything which may be done under this act which is declared to be unlawful. That is rather general. However, I am not going to take up time in discussing it if the Senator from Missouri insists on the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, perhaps it would be proper to suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. RANSDELL. Oh, no, let us go on. We are not objecting to the amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. Very well.

Mr. REED. I thought that the chairman of the committee and myself had practically agreed upon this matter.

Mr. FLETCHER. I said that while I do not feel authorized to consent to the amendment, I am not going to resist it.

Mr. REED. Do I understand that the Senator from Utah desires to hold this matter a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is so advised.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I have no desire to talk about the amendment. I spoke this morning upon it, when I expressed my abhorrence of sending men to the penitentiary for violating an order issued by an individual. I am quite content with the statement of the chairman that he does not want to consent to the amendment, but does not resist it, and will let the matter come to a vote.

Mr. FLETCHER. I desire to ask if that is the only amendment which the Senator from Missouri intends to offer?

Mr. REED. I intend, then, to move to strike out the imprisonment clause, and to insert in lieu of the penitentiary sentence the words:

And the President may by direct order seize the offending vessel and operate it in such manner as the public interest may demand.

That, however, will come up in a minute, and I think we might now vote on the amendment which I have already proposed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. REED. I now move, on page 10, line 18, to strike out the words "or by imprisonment for not more than two years, or both," and insert in lieu thereof the words "and the President may by direct order seize the offending vessel and operate it in such manner as the public interest may demand."

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Missouri a question?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator's amendment shall be agreed to and the words he proposes to substitute are inserted, that would give the President authority to seize and operate a foreign vessel as he might see fit, would it not?

Mr. REED. Yes; whatever vessels would come within the provisions of this act. If a vessel does not come within the provisions of the act, the President could not take it. If we could fine the proprietor or send the proprietor to the penitentiary, then, of course, it would not be nearly so offensive to seize the vessel as it would be to do that.

My only notion about it is that I am opposed to putting the people of the United States in a position, where, if they believe a law is invalid and desire to test it, they must do it at the risk of going to the penitentiary. At the same time, I realize the importance of providing that a vessel can not charge enormous freight rates, making a large amount of money, pay its fine, and then go on violating the law. Hence I thought it would be a good proposition to give the President the power to commandeer the vessel, to take it over. It is a drastic power, but I think it is one that is necessary; and I make that suggestion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 10, line 18, it is proposed to strike out "or by imprisonment for not more than two years, or both," and to insert "and the President may by direct order seize the offending vessel and operate it in such manner as the public interest may demand."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I desire to offer as a new section the amendment to the bill which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Washington will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add as a new section the following:

SEC. 18. That all steam vessels owned or operated by the United States Shipping Board, or any corporation organized or controlled by it, shall be subject to all the provisions of title 52 of the Revised Statutes of the United States for the regulation of steam vessels and acts amendatory thereof or supplemental thereto.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I introduced this proposition as a separate bill several days ago, but the committee has not yet had time to consider it. I will state briefly the reasons for presenting it.

Mr. REED. What is the act to which the Senator refers in his amendment? I wish he would read the act to which he refers.

Mr. JONES of Washington. It is section 4400 of the Revised Statutes, and is the second provision in title 52 of the Revised Statutes. It reads as follows:

SEC. 4400. All steam vessels navigating any waters of the United States which are common highways of commerce, or open to general or competitive navigation, excepting public vessels of the United States, vessels of other countries, and boats propelled in whole or in part by steam for navigating canals, shall be subject to the provisions of this title.

That is the title which requires masters, lifeboats, inspections, and all that sort of thing for steam vessels, "excepting public vessels of the United States." It has been held by one of the disbursing officers, I think, of the Government that by reason of that language being in the law the merchant vessels operated by the Shipping Board do not come within its provisions.

The sole purpose of this amendment is to make steam vessels owned and operated by the United States Shipping Board, not naval vessels nor vessels operated by the War Department or vessels of similar character, but vessels owned, operated, and controlled by the Shipping Board or any corporation organized under it, to be subject to the same precautions for the preservation of life, the protection of the crew, and all that sort of thing to which private vessels are subject, because the vessels under the Shipping Board are in effect private merchant vessels.

Mr. REED. I desire to ask the Senator a question. Is the act referred to in his amendment what is commonly known as the La Follette Act?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Oh, no. It is Title 52 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, extending from section 4400 to section 4523, relating to the general regulation of steam vessels.

Mr. REED. I did not have the book before me, and, of course, I could not tell what the act was by the mere number.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I understand that.

Mr. REED. I have some reasonable degree of familiarity with those regulations; but, Mr. President, they are very long, and I am not sure, without going over them carefully, that they may not contain provisions which would seriously interfere with the operation of these public vessels. I myself am not prepared to vote on the amendment, because I have learned that it is a very good idea to look at a statute before you make it apply.

Mr. JONES of Washington. That is true; but does the Senator consider these merchant cargo vessels, for instance, those of the Shipping Board, as public vessels in the ordinary sense?

Mr. REED. I think they are.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Or are they not really the same as private merchant vessels engaged in commerce?

Mr. REED. Well, they occupy a position that, of course, is different from the position of the private vessel as heretofore understood; and they also occupy a position different from the public vessel as heretofore understood, because that public vessel was simply performing the ordinary work of the Government?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes.

Mr. REED. But now the Government has taken over these vessels; it has taken them over in a time of war; it has built certain vessels to operate in time of war; and it is doing that upon the theory that the work in which the vessels are now employed is in aid of the war, and that, although they may be carrying coal from one private company to another private company or performing similar work, still that work is necessary to the war and bears a relation to the war of such a nature as to make it public—a public charge and a public duty.

I am not prepared to say that provisions which are necessary and proper when they relate to the conduct of a privately owned vessel ought to be imposed upon vessels the United States Government is buying or building and operating in connection with its war policy. If the Senator insists upon his amendment, I certainly think that some attention ought to be given to the provisions of the Revised Statutes to which the amendment refers.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The suggestions which the Senator from Missouri makes appeal to me; I appreciate their force; and I also appreciate the fact that this amendment has not been considered by the committee and that the committee has not yet had the opportunity to do so. I myself think that the Government of the United States ought not to operate these merchant ships without complying with the same provisions for the protection of the crew, of those who are passengers, and of those who may go upon them as are required of private ships; but I am not going to press this amendment, in view of the suggestions made by the Senator from Missouri. As I said before, I appreciate their force, and I think it is a measure that ought to have the careful consideration of the committee. If there are substantial reasons why the crews of these cargo ships should not be protected from shipwreck and the danger of shipwreck, if there are reasons why the passengers who may be carried upon these ships shall not have the protection in the way of lifeboats, inspection, and so forth, such as we require of private vessels, of course that should be taken into consideration. Therefore, Mr. President, I shall withdraw the amendment and let the bill I have introduced embodying the amendment be considered by the committee.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I am very glad the Senator does that, because, while I have no doubt there is a great deal of merit in the proposition he submits, I think it ought to go to the committee and be considered by the committee. The fact is the pending bill is limited to war times and not exceeding nine months beyond; we are in war and surrounded by war conditions, and it might not be possible to comply with all the provisions of the statutes to which the Senator has referred. I repeat, I am very glad the Senator withdraws the amendment.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I merely wish to express the hope that the committee will give this matter some consideration before very long.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands the Senator from Washington withdraws the amendment.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes; I withdraw the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ASHURST in the chair). The bill is still before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator from Florida whether he does not consider that section 13 is rather too broad? As I interpret it, it places no restriction upon the power of those who are to administer this bill to requisition any docks or wharves or terminal facilities, no matter by whom they are owned and no matter the purposes to which they are put. It would seem to me that if those having the administration of this proposed act desired the permanent ownership of and control by the Government of the vessels referred to in this bill they could seize all the wharves and terminal facilities, lighterage boats, and so forth, with a view to destroying private ownership of the facilities used in water transportation. If the Government owned all wharves, terminals, and so forth, employed by shipping, and also a large number of ships, private ownership could scarcely compete with the Government, and the result would be that the shipping business would be controlled by the Government.

Mr. FLETCHER. I will say, Mr. President, that this section provides—

That the President shall have power to acquire, by purchase or lease, or to requisition the title to or temporary possession of, or to assume temporary control of, any dry dock, wharves, or loading or discharging terminal facilities in any port in the United States, or warehouses, equipment, or terminal railways connected therewith.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator pardon me?

Mr. FLETCHER. Yes.

Mr. KING. I think if the Senator will examine the first two lines he will find that they are not qualified by the word "temporary." They read:

That the President shall have power to acquire, by purchase or lease—

That is, not for temporary purposes—or to requisition the title to or temporary possession of.

It not only gives the power to acquire temporarily certain things, but it gives the power to the Shipping Board to acquire the fee.

Mr. FLETCHER. But I think the Senator will agree that this whole matter is limited to the duration of the act, which is only six months, or possibly nine months, after the declaration of peace; it is only during the war that that can be done; and that is a very essential authority to give, because in handling shipping it is important to control terminals and docks, otherwise you can not control the discharge of the cargo or the loading of the ship; you can not control the time that it takes to go across and come back. It is necessary to have some sort of power to lay hold of docks and terminals if it becomes necessary to do so; otherwise you are hampered tremendously in the handling of the shipping.

Mr. KING. If the Senator will pardon me, I do not controvert that position at all; I am in perfect accord with him. There must be power in this board to requisition the terminals and docks and shipping facilities that are required in order properly to execute the provisions of the bill; but the point I am trying to make is that the bill not only gives the power to this board to requisition for temporary uses, but it confers upon the board—that is, upon the President and, of course, he will exercise his functions through the board—the power to acquire by purchase or lease all of the facilities to which reference has been made. The point I am trying to make is that this board, if it is disposed to put the Government in permanent control of the shipping interests of the country and crowd off from the high seas private enterprise and private shipping, may go ahead and purchase all the valuable wharves and terminal facilities, so that when the vessels are restored to the owners, if that shall be done, the owners of the boats would have no terminal facilities and no wharves, absolutely essential if they are to resume their private business. It seems to me this bill gives too much power and would enable those in charge to embark the Government, so far as they possibly could, upon a policy that would be destructive or certainly very injurious to private activities after the war is over.

Mr. FLETCHER. I think the Senator can certainly trust the President not to do anything that would interfere with private enterprise or the successful building up of our shipping interests.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I am perfectly willing to trust the President, but I do not have the same trust in some of the boards, commissions, and bureaus organized under legislative authority. There are some officials or bureaus that show too great a predilliction to perpetuate the Government in power after the war shall end; that is, who would transfer to the Government the ownership and control of activities that ought to belong to private enterprise. And we all know that many governmental agencies seek to aggrandize themselves and would like to control the business affairs of many of the industries developed and owned by private persons or corporations.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the junior Senator from Utah yield to his colleague?

Mr. KING. I yield the floor.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, section 13 authorizes the President of the United States to purchase "any dry docks, wharves, or loading or discharging terminal facilities in any port of the United States, or warehouses, equipment, or terminal railways connected therewith." In other words, it authorizes the expenditure, if the President or his subordinates decide it to be necessary, of billions of dollars. There is no reference to the sale of the property after the war has ended or after the necessities of the Government for the use of the same have ceased, but this provision gives the President power to purchase all of the wharves in the United States, all of the docks in the United States, all of the loading and discharging terminal facilities in the United States, and all of the warehouses, equipment, or terminal railways connected therewith.

Mr. FLETCHER. I will suggest this, to meet the objections which have been raised, namely, to strike out the words "to acquire by purchase or lease or" and insert after the word "to," in line 12, the words "lease or," so that it will read:

That the President shall have power to lease or requisition the title to or possession of.

Mr. SMOOT. That would be a very great improvement in the bill, and I think the amendment ought to be made.

Mr. KING. That will satisfy me and meet the objection that I have urged.

Mr. FLETCHER. If the junior Senator from Utah will make that motion, I will accept the amendment.

Mr. KING. I move to amend section 13 as follows.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 13, page 8, lines 11 and 12, it is proposed to strike out the words "to acquire by purchase or lease or," and after the word "to," in line 12, to insert the words "lease or," so that it will read:

That the President shall have power to lease or requisition—

And so forth.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment submitted by the Senator from Utah.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator having this bill in charge whether or not the bill confers upon the commission or the board that will execute it the power to discriminate against persons engaged in transportation and in commerce with other nations? Would not the board have the power to discriminate against one shipper in favor of another?

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I think it is contemplated that general regulations will be determined upon and general rules laid down. For instance, when it comes to the question of fixing freight rates there will be a general order made with reference to those rates, and that order will apply to everybody, every shipper, and particularly as to every route; for instance, to Buenos Aires or to Rio. Freights across the Atlantic, and so forth, will be general, and there will be no discrimination in that respect. The bill requires, as the Senator will see, by an amendment that we put in it, that the rates shall be made public. They are required to be filed with the Shipping Board, where the public can have access to them.

Mr. KING. At any rate, it puts the power in this commission to determine the rates to private shippers who own their own ships and who may be shipping their own products.

Mr. FLETCHER. Practically, there are no ships of that sort. All ships now are doing Government business; and that is controlled, really, by the War Trade Board rather than by the Shipping Board.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I shall not oppose the passage of this bill, although I regard it as containing dangerous features. The war calls for the interruption of many private activities; necessarily, it dislocates industrial matters and demands sacrifices upon the part of all. I only hope that the power herein conferred will be wisely exercised and that no precedent will be claimed that will embarrass the country after the war is over. There will be some who will demand that the Government shall continue to control not only the water transportation of the Nation but all railroad and other facilities employed for such purpose. It is to be hoped that rational counsels shall prevail, and that we may return to the paths of safety and a proper recognition of the rights of persons and property.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Shall the amendments be engrossed and the bill be read a third time?

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The bill was passed.

AMENDMENT OF WAR-RISK INSURANCE ACT.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 11048. This is the bill, to which I called the attention of the Senate on yesterday, which cares for the Marine Insurance Bureau, and it is very essential that it should be passed before any recess is had.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do.

Mr. FLETCHER. I wish the Senator would let us take up another bill, a companion bill to the one just passed.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I hope that will not be done at this time, Mr. President. I do not think the one that has just been passed ought to have been pushed in. I thought the bill to which I refer was to come immediately after the other bill of which the Senator has charge.

Mr. FLETCHER. As a matter of fact, the other bill was disposed of very quickly, and the Senator was present.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Senator had told me a few moments before that it would take at least a half hour.

Mr. FLETCHER. I thought it would; but there was no debate at all upon it, and it passed.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I do not think this bill will take 10 minutes.

Mr. FLETCHER. I was going to say to the Senator that these bills have been reported and been on the calendar since June 27, so that I really think they should have a prior right as against bills that were reported out only yesterday; but I do not like to stand in the way of the passage of this bill. I know the Senator is anxious to have it passed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Georgia asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill the title of which will be stated by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 11048) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the establishment of a Bureau of War-Risk Insurance in the Treasury Department," approved September 2, 1914, as amended by the act approved June 12, 1917.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill which had been reported from the Committee on Finance with amendments.

The first amendment was, on page 1, line 3, after the words "That the," to strike out "Act entitled 'An act to authorize the establishment of a Bureau of War-Risk Insurance in the Treasury Department,' approved September 2, 1914, as amended by the act approved June 12, 1917," and insert "war-risk insurance act," so as to read:

That the war-risk insurance act is hereby amended by adding to such act a new section, to be known as section 2b, to read as follows:

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 2, page 3, line 7, after the word "of," to strike out "such act as amended by an act entitled 'An act to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the establishment of a Bureau of War-Risk Insurance in the Treasury Department," approved September 2, 1914, and for other purposes,' approved June 12, 1917," and insert "the war-risk insurance act," so as to read:

SEC. 2. That section 5 of the war-risk insurance act is hereby amended to read as follows.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 3, page 4, line 14, after the word "of," to strike out "such act as amended by an act entitled 'An act to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the establishment of a Bureau of War-Risk Insurance in the Treasury Department," approved September 2, 1914, and for other purposes,' approved June 12, 1917," and insert "the war-risk insurance act," so as to read:

SEC. 3. That section 9 of the war-risk insurance act is hereby amended to read as follows.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 4, page 4, line 25, after the words "in so far as," to strike out "it authorizes insurance by the United States against loss or damage by risks of war" and insert "the Division of Marine and Seamen's Insurance is concerned"; and on line 7, page 5, after the word "the," to strike out "Bureau of War Risk" and insert "Division of Marine and Seamen's," so as to read:

SEC. 9. That the President is authorized whenever, in his judgment, the necessity of further war insurance by the United States shall have ceased to exist to suspend the operation of this act, in so far as the Division of Marine and Seamen's Insurance is concerned, which suspension shall be made in any event within six months after the end of the war, but shall not affect any insurance outstanding at the time or any claims pending adjustment. For the purpose of the final adjustment of any such outstanding insurance or claims the Division of Marine and Seamen's Insurance may, in the discretion of the President, be continued in existence for a period not exceeding three years after such suspension.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "An act to amend the war-risk insurance act."

CONVICT-MADE GOODS AT ATLANTA FEDERAL PENITENTIARY.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, there is another bill to which I call the attention of the Senate, H. R. 8938. I have a letter from the President urging the immediate passage of this bill, and I ask unanimous consent to dispose of it at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Georgia asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of H. R. 8938, the title of which will be stated by the Secretary.

Mr. SMOOT. What is the calendar number?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is Order of Business No. 498.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 8938) to equip the United States penitentiary, Atlanta, Ga., for the manufacture of supplies for the use of the Government, for the compensation of prisoners for their labor, and for other purposes.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Senator from Georgia does not ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of this bill, does he?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. I know there are a good many Senators who are opposed to it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Opposed to this bill?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; so they have stated to me.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I have not heard of it.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, let the bill be read before unanimous consent is given.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the bill.

The Secretary read the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I should like to make a statement about the bill before the request is finally acted upon.

There are two features of the bill. One is for the purchase of additional land in connection with the penitentiary. The other is to put weaving machinery into a plant at the penitentiary.

With reference to the increased area of land, I have had occasion to examine what has been accomplished upon a little farm of about 100 acres. It has shown a net profit to the Government in its operation of nearly 10 per cent upon the $200,000. It has shown $16,000 to $18,000 net profit from its yearly operations. It is believed by the superintendent of prisons, and my own investigation leads me to the same conclusion, that if this money is used to purchase an additional tract of land it will make a return far in excess of any ordinary percentages and will largely contribute to pay the expense of feeding and caring for the convicts.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. POINDEXTER. What does the bill provide as to the permanent title to the land which is to be acquired?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The land is to be purchased by the United States Government and owned by the United States Government as a part of its penitentiary plant.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Then the State of Georgia is willing permanently to turn over its penitentiary and its convicts to the Government of the United States?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Oh, no; this is the national penitentiary. This is our largest national penitentiary.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I thought it related to the State penitentiary.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Oh, no. It is one of the three national penitentiaries. The report of the Superintendent of Prisons shows that the number of prisoners has largely increased in the past few years. They have gone up now to between 1,500 and 1,600. Prisoners from the entire East are sent there, prisoners from New York and the New England States, and there are a large number of prisoners there from the mountain section. The prohibition law has somewhat increased the number of prisoners on account of illicit distilling.

The question is one of furnishing work to the prisoners. An authorization of $200,000 for the enlargement of the farm is carried, with the view of purchasing quite a large tract of land and adding it to the farm cultivated. I have no doubt that, with the capable farm management we now have there, this land will bring in toward the support of the prisoners from thirty to forty thousand dollars a year, probably $50,000, after it has been improved by careful cultivation.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, as I understand, this land is to be operated for agricultural purposes?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Entirely.

Mr. McCUMBER. And the products sold?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The products are to be used in the penitentiary, and, as amended, used in Government cantonments or for the use of the military and naval forces. They are not to be sold to the public at large. They are to be used by the United States Government to meet its own necessities.

Mr. McCUMBER. Inasmuch as the Senator has stated that there would be such immense profits made in the farming operations there, I was wondering how he arrived at the profits if the products are simply consumed. I was curious as to the basis of arriving at the profits.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I can answer the Senator very easily. The products of the farm turned into the penitentiary for the use of the prisoners were kept a matter of record by the man at the head of the farm, and current prices were put opposite the products furnished each day and each week.

Mr. McCUMBER. Does the Senator mean by "current prices" the retail prices of the products?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No; I mean the current prices of similar products disposed of in the same quantities, which were practically wholesale prices.

Mr. McCUMBER. Then it would mean, naturally, the farm prices of the products.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The farm price, the price that the management would have paid had he gone on the market and bought to the best advantage.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, that is what I am trying to get at. There is a vast difference between what the management of the penitentiary would have to pay if he has to go out and purchase the finished product and the price at which the farmer or the management of a farming institution would have to sell the raw product. That is why I am trying to find out what the basis was.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It is the finished product that is furnished from the farm for the inmates of the penitentiary.

Mr. McCUMBER. What do they raise, may I ask?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Meat, butter, eggs, milk, and so on. They raise large quantities of milk, large quantities of butter, large quantities of eggs, poultry, hogs, and vegetables of all kinds. The size of the farm has not been sufficient to produce grain in any quantity, except green corn and other grain that really takes the character of vegetables.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I will state that the provision authorizing the $200,000 expenditure is, however, for the acquisition or purchase of land only.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. It also provides that—

> The products of any such agricultural development shall be utilized in said penitentiary or be sold to the Government of the United States for the use of the military and naval forces of the United States.

In other words, the land is to be used for agricultural purposes?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not think there is any authority whatever to use it to raise cattle or hogs.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Why, a hog is an agricultural product.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not so understand.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Oh, I think so. I think a properly managed farm would have some hogs on it.

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, yes; it would have some hogs on it, but I never have understood that a hog was an agricultural product.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I think that is covered by this language.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I want to say that it is very important that they should raise hogs. The leavings from the kitchen, all the surplus offal from the kitchen, can be used to feed the hogs; and if that is supplemented by corn raised on the farm, they can to a large extent raise their own pork there for the convicts.

Mr. SMOOT. That is right.

Mr. NELSON. I want to say, if the Senator will allow me, that we have a State reformatory at St. Cloud, and we have quite a farm annexed to that, and the convicts raise a good deal of the vegetables, potatoes, milk, cream, and butter used in the reformatory; and I presume in time they will be able to raise their own pork. They do raise a good deal of their beef now.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I believe that, properly handled, this investment in agricultural land would be worth, when brought to a proper state of cultivation, $50,000 a year toward feeding the inmates; and if the Senator does not think the language is broad enough I should be glad to have him suggest an amendment which would make it broader, because the farmer, I understand, raises hogs on the present farm.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; there is no limitation on him.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. And he is extremely careful to obtain all the scraps from the penitentiary and all the material that goes into the scrap basket.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that that is what he ought to do; and every public institution that I know of, such as insane asylums and penitentiaries and other penal institutions, follow that policy. All I was calling the Senator's attention to was that the wording of the bill, in my opinion, authorizes the purchase of the land, and then it authorizes the products of any such agricultural development to be "utilized in said penitentiary, or be sold to the Government of the United States for the use of the military and naval forces of the United States." I think the wording of it would limit it so that they could only use penitentiary products for the purposes named, and I thought that was a limitation that should not apply.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I should be glad to make that language clearly broad enough, because my own view is that the farm ought to be run upon the same plan as the present farm, only much enlarged, and that it can largely contribute toward the expense of feeding the convicts.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I really do not think it needs a change so far as the words "agricultural products" or "agricultural development" are concerned. When you raise corn on a farm it is an agricultural product. If you put the corn into a hog the hog becomes an agricultural product.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It is even a little broader; it says "the products of any such agricultural development." Now, one of the products of that development will be to raise hogs.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I want to say that in addition to securing food supplies from this farm, one great advantage of this plan—and I had occasion to look into it years ago—is that it affords the convicts an opportunity for outdoor life and outdoor work. You take a convict who is confined in shop work all the time, and it is very confining, and they are all exceedingly glad to get an opportunity to work outside and work on the farm; so that a farm attached to a prison like this, where they can secure proper agricultural land, has a twofold advantage. First, it is for the advantage of the convicts, for the improvement of their moral and physical status. In the next place, it is a very economical proposition. A lot of the stuff around the prison would go to waste that they can use in connection with the farm and in that way save expense to the State.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, let me suggest to the Senator an amendment which I think would at least make it clearer, by striking out the word "development" and inserting the words "the products, including live stock," so that it will read:

> The products of any such agricultural development, including live stock, shall be utilized in said penitentiary or be sold to the Government of the United States—

And so forth.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Would it not be better to say, "The products, including live stock, of any such agricultural development," or "the products of any such agricultural development, including live stock"? Just get the live stock in, so that it shall be clearly understood that we authorize them to raise live stock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Georgia asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill. Is there objection to the request?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with an amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Now, Mr. President, after the word "development," in line 18, page 2, I suggest that we add the words "including live stock."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Georgia offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 18, after the word "development," it is proposed to insert the words "including live stock."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, this bill authorizes the expenditure of $1,200,000. I should like to ask the Senator having the bill in charge what are the chances of securing $650,000 worth of machinery and equipment to carry out the purposes of the act?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I have the statement of the superintendent of prisons that he had an option on the machinery, which expired a short time ago, and that he has been informally advised that they were still satisfied it could be furnished.

Mr. SMOOT. Was it an option on secondhand machinery?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No; from the manufacturers of weaving machines.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not think there is a manufacturer in the United States who has a loom on hand.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am inaccurate as to the time. The time of the option was November, 1917.

Mr. Duehay says:

> We have proposals from a number of different manufacturers of machinery. These proposals were secured from them about November 20, 1917. At that time they gave me an option until February 1, 1918, to accept the proposals.

Mr. SMOOT. How many looms are they going to purchase? Does it state?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. Duehay, on page 6 of his testimony, describes all the material, twisters, winders, warp compressors, looms, cloth room, warpers, elevators, motors, light wiring, power, conduits, switch board, transformers, motor and shelf supports, shafting, belting, compressed air, and supplies.

Mr. SMOOT. When I asked the question I doubted very much whether we could get $650,000 worth of machinery necessary to start this business within any reasonable time.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. This is the statement:

> Mr. DUEHAY. We have proposals from a number of different manufacturers of the machinery. These proposals were secured from them about November 20, 1917. At that time they gave me an option until February 1, 1918, to accept the proposals. Since then they have communicated with me, some by letter and some by calling on me personally, and expressed willingness to enter into a contract if I was able to do so. I have been unable to do so, because we have not authority at the present to enter into a contract for any part of this machinery; and I believe, from my conversations with the representatives of these different manufacturers, that I can secure the machinery.

That is the only evidence I have on the subject.

Mr. SMOOT. I think they will have a very hard time in doing it. In section 5 there is a working capital provided of $350,000. I can not see why you want a working capital of $350,000 with a plant the equipment of which costs $650,000. I know in ordinary times, when goods are sold upon four months' credit, it would never pay an institution to have $350,000 as a working capital with machinery costing only $650,000. In this particular case the working capital would not be as necessary as it would with a private corporation, because as the goods are produced they are immediately sent to the Navy or Military Department of the Government, and payment will be made within 30 days after the goods are shipped. If you had $100,000 working capital, that would be all, in my judgment, that would be necessary. I say that not with the idea of cutting the appropriation down so that the institution could not be worked successfully, but I say it based on the experience that I have had in running machinery of a similar character.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I take it for granted that they buy their yarn for the purpose of weaving.

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Those yarns are not sold for spot cash as a rule.

Mr. SMOOT. They are hardly ever sold for spot cash. Indeed, I do not think 5 per cent of them are sold for spot cash. They are always sold on time. They could weave the cloth and get it finished and get the returns from the Treasury of the United States perhaps as quickly as their bills would fall due.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If the Senator suggests an amendment reducing the working capital——

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator if we give $150,000 it will be $50,000 more than is really necessary.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If the Senator suggests an amendment making it $150,000, I will accept it.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Utah is utterly mistaken. We have had some experience in Minnesota in this matter.

We have in our State prisons a plant for manufacturing agricultural implements. We have made an appropriation to give that prison what we call a revolving fund of over $1,000,000. It is used to buy material. They have the fund on hand, and they buy the material wherever they can get it cheapest, and then they sell the product to the farmers partly on time, and they need a big revolving fund. A revolving fund of $150,000 is not enough to run this prison.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator may know, of course, more about it than the Senator from Utah, but I want to say to the Senator the case he cites does not compare with this in any way. As soon as the goods are made they are shipped to the Government of the United States, and checks upon the Treasury are sent immediately.

The machinery that is ordered in the penitentiary of Minnesota that the Senator refers to takes months and months to make and after it is sold to the farmers it takes months and months to be paid for, and of course there must be allowed a larger revolving fund. There is no such working in this provision. All the penitentiary has to do is to buy the yarns or beams. The warp or beam is put in the loom and the loom is started within an hour and the weaver begins to weave the cloth. It is duck that is proposed to be made. It does not have to be dyed. Simply washed, dried, and bolted, then sent to the War or Navy Department, and a check on the Treasury of the United States is returned.

Mr. NELSON. How does the Senator know they are going to start with a partly manufactured product? May they not start with the raw material?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No; this bill does not allow it.

Mr. SMOOT. They are not going to start with the raw material. They are going to purchase the warp on the beam or in shape to be beamed. I assure the Senator from Georgia that at no time will they ever want a working fund of more than $150,000.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am disposed to believe that the Senator from Utah is right.

Mr. NELSON. I do not believe he is right. He is wrong, and you will find that you are wrong before you get through.

Mr. SMOOT. We will try it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I was going to say before we agree on the measure I can confer still further with the superintendent of prisons. The Senator is right in saying that no raw material is to be bought. We put no spinning machinery in the mill.

Mr. SMOOT. I move to strike out "$350,000" and insert "$150,000."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Utah.

On a division the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The committee amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 18, strike out "supplying such correctional institutions as the Attorney General may designate, or in his discretion may be sold," and insert "said penitentiary or be sold to the Government of the United States for the use of the military and naval forces of the United States."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I simply want to express my dissent from the bill.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by G. F. Turner, one of its clerks, announced that the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 44 to the bill (H. R. 9054) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and agree to the same with amendments, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House insists upon its amendments to the amendment of the Senate No. 44 to the bill (H. R. 9054) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, asks a conference with the Senate, and had appointed Mr. LEVER, Mr. LEE, Mr. CANDLER, Mr. HAUGEN, and Mr. MCLAUGHLIN managers at the conference on the part of the House.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATIONS, CONFERENCE REPORT.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives on the amendment of the Senate No. 44 to House bill 9054, which was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate No. 44 to the bill (H. R. 9054) entitled "An act making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919," and agree to the same with the following amendments:

(1) In line 10, after the word "benefits," insert "of the guaranty provided for in this section, he is authorized."

(2) In line 39 strike out all after the word "than" down to and including the word "produced," in line 41, and insert "$2.40 per bushel at the principal interior primary markets designated by the President by proclamation issued by him February 21, 1918, and at such other places as the President may designate.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I move that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House to the amendment numbered 44 to the Agricultural appropriation bill for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oklahoma moves that the Senator concur in the amendments of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. GERRY. I ask unanimous consent to proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 3438) to prevent corrupt practices in the election of Senators, Representatives, or Delegates in Congress.

Mr. FLETCHER. If the bill is going to lead to discussion, I hope the Senator will not ask for its consideration. There is another bill reported from the Committee on Commerce which has the unanimous favorable report of the House committee, and favorable action by the House, and was reported by the Commerce Committee of the Senate unanimously. It is a very important bill, and it ought to be acted on as early as possible. It is an amendment to the present shipping law.

Mr. MARTIN. I ask that House joint resolution No. 311 be laid before the Senate. It was subject to be called up, and I ask that it be now laid before the Senate.

Mr. GERRY. I yield temporarily for that purpose.

Mr. MARTIN. I will state that by unanimous consent it was to come before the Senate whenever I called it up.

Mr. GERRY. I yield to the chairman for that purpose.

EXTENSION OF APPROPRIATIONS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 311) making appropriations for certain necessary operations of the Government and of the District of Columbia for the month of July, 1918, and for other purposes.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, the Agricultural appropriation bill, which has now been passed by the House and agreed to by the Senate reads as follows:

That the following sums be, and they are hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, in full compensation for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, for the purposes and objects hereinafter expressed, namely.

I respectfully call attention to the fact that this is an appropriation for the expenses of the Agricultural Department beginning on the 1st day of July, 1918, and ending on the 30th day of June, 1919. That being the case, it is wholly unnecessary to include in the joint resolution the words "Agricultural Department," because the bill has now passed the Senate and passed the House. We are in actual agreement, and it will cover everything that has been expended by that department from the 30th day of June, 1918. I therefore hope that the Senator from Virginia will agree to have that clause stricken out.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, one objection to making a change is that it necessitates sending back the joint resolution to the House. It will do no harm because it only provides for such expenses as may have been incurred and are not provided for by the Agricultural bill. There is no possibility of duplicating the appropriations under the provisions of the joint resolution.

Mr. McCUMBER. The joint resolution carries them over until what time? I have not had time to read it.

Mr. MARTIN. Until the regular Agricultural appropriation bill is passed. It is not to continue after the Agricultural bill is passed. Such expenses as may have been incurred in the meantime and not provided for in the Agricultural bill are provided for by the joint resolution.

Mr. McCUMBER. Suppose the Agricultural bill which has passed the Senate and passed the House should still fail, where would we then be left?

Mr. MARTIN. As I understand, the Agricultural bill can not fail. It has passed both Houses.

Mr. McCUMBER. A bill can not become a law until it is approved by the President of the United States.

Mr. MARTIN. It might be vetoed; that is a possibility; but I do not apprehend anything of the sort. If it should be, there would still be the more necessity for this joint resolution, because it provides for the department until the Agricultural bill shall pass.

Mr. McCUMBER. That is, until it becomes a law?

Mr. MARTIN. Undoubtedly that is the case.

Mr. McCUMBER. Then if by any possibility it should not become a law, we are just exactly in the condition we have been attempting to extricate ourselves from and have so far succeeded in doing.

Mr. MARTIN. No; the joint resolution would take care of those expenditures until the Agricultural bill becomes a law.

Mr. McCUMBER. But the Agricultural bill now takes care of them anyway when it becomes a law, and it may be signed to-morrow.

Mr. MARTIN. Then this only provides where the Agricultural bill does not provide.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think the Senator either does not comprehend the point I have in mind, or I do not quite understand him. I do not anticipate that the Senator believes we are going to suffer any inconvenience if the bill is signed, and it can be signed to-morrow as it has passed to-day, whereas if for any reason the bill should not be approved, then the Agricultural appropriations that were made a year ago will continue through the entire fiscal year of 1919 if we were unable to get through another Agricultural bill; and in the meantime we have accomplished in that way just exactly what many of us desired should not be accomplished, and that is to override the will of Congress, which I believe to be the will of the country, that we should have $2.50 per bushel for our wheat now compromised at $2.40 a bushel.

If the Senator has no fear but what that bill will be signed, certainly there is no occasion on earth for keeping in the joint resolution the words "Agricultural Department," and they can only be kept in in anticipation that by some possibility the bill will not become a law.

Mr. MARTIN. The Senator is mistaken as to my intention in the matter. I have not the slightest idea that the President will veto it, although I have no information whatever on the subject. The joint resolution simply provides for necessary expenses of the Agricultural Department until the Agricultural appropriation bill is passed.

Mr. McCUMBER. The bill has been passed.

Mr. MARTIN. I thought the Senator just talked on the theory that it had not passed and could not be passed until the President signs it. I can not see any harm to come by passing the joint resolution.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think we all understand the situation and the danger of leaving that clause in the joint resolution. I therefore move to strike out the words "the Department of Agriculture."

Mr. MARTIN. It is for the Senate to say what it will do.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. MARTIN. If the Senate thinks the Agricultural Department should not be provided for, it is for the Senate to say.

Mr. McCUMBER. In lines 4 and 5, on the first page of the joint resolution, I move to strike out the words "and the Department of Agriculture, including food-production operations heretofore provided for by law."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending amendment is that of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN], on page 2, line 3, to strike out the word "July" and insert the word "August." The Senator from North Dakota will withhold his amendment until this is disposed of.

Mr. McCUMBER. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator from Virginia a question or two before that amendment is voted on. I understand the Senator wants the joint resolution made to cover August?

Mr. MARTIN. That is right.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I wish to ask the Senator this question. Some time ago the House passed a bill (H. R. 11945) to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to carry out, during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, the purposes of the act entitled "An act to provide further for the national security and defense by stimulating agriculture and facilitating the distribution of agricultural products." I wish to ask the Senator from Virginia whether this resolution is intended to take care of the provisions of that act? In other words, is the joint resolution intended to make available any money to carry out the provisions of the act of August 10, 1917, that are covered by House bill 11945; or is it just intended to take care of the ordinary general appropriations in the bill known as the Agricultural appropriation bill?

Mr. MARTIN. That is all, Mr. President, as I understand it; nothing else.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I yield.

Mr. GORE. I rather think the Senator from Virginia is in error about it.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I think so, too; but I wanted to be sure about it.

Mr. GORE. I say I rather think the Senator from Virginia is in error, and the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota ought to be put in such a form as to make provision for that unless he desires to arrest that appropriation also that has not been involved in the controversy which has been going forward here.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I wish to say to the Senator from Virginia, as his position has been that the joint resolution does not and was not intended to take care of the act of August 10, 1917, I know that when the committee reported that a great many voted for reporting it on the statement that it was not intended to take care and did not take care of the provisions of that act. What I want to make certain is to see that it does not take care of the provisions of that act.

Mr. REED. I am anxious to know why not take care of it. I do not understand the situation.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I do not see any necessity of taking care of it by the joint resolution when we have a bill here on our calendar reported from the committee and ready to be taken up for passage. If anyone can tell me why we should not proceed to pass it I should like to hear the reason.

Mr. REED. I want to make an inquiry. I confess I may be confused about the bill. I understand the question to be whether the present bill is to take care of all the necessities of the Agricultural Department, or whether it will take care of a part of them, and then it will be necessary to pass a subsequent bill to take care of the balance. That is the situation, is it not? Now, when we are about ready to close up all these matters, taking care of various departments, why should we not really take care of them? Why should we leave something to another bill which, if it comes here for consideration, may or may not pass, and if it does pass here and goes to the House may or may not pass there. Why not in this matter at this time take care of these difficulties?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I think we almost universally pass a joint resolution extending appropriations to take care of the regular appropriation bills. That is the general understanding, and I am satisfied it was the understanding in the committee that this only took care of the regular Agricultural appropriation bill.

Mr. OVERMAN. It reads:

> That the necessary operations of the Government, so far as they relate to the support of the Army and the Department of Agriculture, including food-production operations heretofore provided for by law.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I think those very words, "including food-production operations heretofore provided for by law," would cover the particular purpose of the act which the House passed.

Mr. MARTIN. It is intended to cover such obligations as have been created by law for which appropriations have not been made. It is only intended to cover the obligations the Government has undertaken in the Agricultural Department and which Congress has not appropriated the money to meet. It does not make any new obligations. It does not create any new service, new duties, or responsibilities anywhere. It simply undertakes to pay for obligations which have been imposed upon the Government under previous law.

Mr. JONES of Washington. It goes outside of the general appropriation bill.

Mr. MARTIN. If some other act has created an obligation in that department, it provides for it. This matter has been gone over very carefully by the Comptroller of the Treasury or his assistant. Mr. KITCHIN, of the House, went over it carefully, and he assured me that it provided for nothing except the obligations of the Government which have been created heretofore by law that are not yet provided for.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The Senator will bear me out in the statement that it was stated in the committee when the joint resolution was reported that it did not take care of things outside of the regular appropriation act and this bill was specifically mentioned in the committee. Some Senators said if it covered the provisions of this bill they would not vote to report it, but the impression——

Mr. MARTIN. There is no obligation on the Government under the bill to which the Senator refers. It is the obligations created under an act passed.

Mr. JONES of Washington. No; the act of August 10, 1917, creates certain provisions for certain things to be done. It appropriates money for the fiscal year ending June 30 of this year. The House bill 11945 carries appropriations for the coming fiscal year to carry out the purposes of the general act of August 10, 1917. I do not like to see those provisions taken care of by a joint resolution here when we have had a bill on the calendar, which has passed the House, for some time, and no attempt is apparently made to take it up for consideration. I think it ought to be considered, and we ought to have an opportunity to consider it.

Mr. MARTIN. In the meantime ought not those obligations to be met?

Mr. JONES of Washington. They ought to be met in an orderly way.

Mr. MARTIN. Whenever that bill passes it supplants the present resolution. The present resolution simply takes care of existing obligations until the bill is passed to which the Senator has referred.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I understand that; and while I know the Senator would not be a party to any such proceeding, I am satisfied it would be welcomed by some if we could postpone this other act by a resolution of this kind.

Mr. MARTIN. I understand, so far from having any purpose of that sort, there is to be a request made for unanimous consent to make that bill the special order now, and if we take a recess that it shall be made a special order immediately on reconvening.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I will say to the Senator——

Mr. MARTIN. I have not a doubt that that course will be taken. I think it is generally understood that it will be taken. This is a resolution simply to take care of the obligations of the Government until that time.

Mr. JONES of Washington. If we can have this bill made the unfinished business, with the understanding that if we have a recess it will not be taken up until after the recess, that would be entirely satisfactory to me.

Mr. MARTIN. That is my expectation, and I will cooperate with the Senator for that purpose.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Very well, Mr. President. Upon that assurance from the Senator from Virginia I shall not press the amendment which I intended to propose now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Virginia.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MARTIN. There are a number of other amendments reported by the committee to the joint resolution, all for the same purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments will be stated.

The next amendment was, on page 2, line 12, to strike out the word "July" and insert in lieu thereof the words "either the month of July or August."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 2, lines 18 and 19, to strike out "month of July" and to insert in lieu thereof the words "month of July or August."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 2, line 23, to strike out the words "month of July" and to insert in lieu thereof "months of July and August."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 3, line 17, after the word "July," to insert "and August."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I have offered an amendment, which I presume is pending.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No.

Mr. McCUMBER. I wish to include the word "and" in the amendment on page 1, so that the portion stricken out will read "and the Department of Agriculture." This leaves in the language "including food production operations heretofore provided for by law."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota, as he now proposes to modify it, will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 1, line 4, after the word "Army," it is proposed to strike out "and the Department of Agriculture."

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, as I understand the Senator's amendment, it is to eliminate the Department of Agriculture altogether?

Mr. McCUMBER. Merely to eliminate the Department of Agriculture; yes.

Mr. MARTIN. I can not see, for the life of me, why that discrimination should be made. It is a useless attack on the Department of Agriculture; but it is for the Senate to determine.

Mr. McCUMBER. Let me explain clearly why it should be made.

Mr. MARTIN. I think I understand it thoroughly, but I should be glad to have the Senator from North Dakota explain it.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

Mr. PHELAN. I understood the Senator from North Dakota was about to explain the reason for his amendment.

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes.

Mr. PHELAN. If that is his purpose, I shall not interrupt at this time.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, we have just passed the Agricultural appropriation bill in both Houses. That appropriation bill makes all the appropriations from the 1st day of July, 1918, to the 30th day of June, 1919. It covers everything that has been expended during the first six days of July for which appropriations have been made. We do not need to make appropriations again for the same purpose. This joint resolution, in addition to what I have already stated, also appropriates the 1918 appropriations for that portion of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, several days of which will have expired before the new law shall go into effect. If the new law should go into effect to-morrow, there would be seven days. Then we have two appropriations, if we allow this to remain, for those seven days; we have the regular appropriation for the fiscal year 1919, which begins on the 1st day of July, 1918, and we have the joint resolution, which also appropriates the same sums which were appropriated last year for the first seven days of July, 1919.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. PHELAN. Does the Senator from North Dakota believe that the auditors of the Treasury would audit duplicate accounts for those seven days on account of the overlapping of the legislation or would they take the common-sense view that the object of Congress was to remedy a condition which was patent to all and only audit the accounts for the exact period of the fiscal year?

Mr. McCUMBER. We have nothing to do with the accounting. The question is, Shall we duplicate the laws? Let us suppose, for instance, that last year there was $150,000 appropriated for the extirpation of hog cholera, and that during the first seven days of July, 1918, we had expended $25,000 of that fund. That was under the old law. This law is enacted and makes another appropriation, we will say, of $150,000. Now, we have $325,000 more than for the first seven days of July, and that is clearly within the limits of the law. Why should we duplicate?

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, my purpose in desiring to take the floor was to make an inquiry. I am not much concerned about these bills, but the Senator from North Dakota assumes that the bill which has just been acted upon both by the Senate and the House of Representatives is a law. As a matter of fact, the bill has been sent to the President for his signature. The Senator from North Dakota is assuming in his argument that the President will sign the bill.

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes.

Mr. PHELAN. Well, Mr. President, that is an unjustifiable assumption. We do not know what the President will do. He has a period of time in which to do it. Shall we sit here and wait upon the President, or must we pass this remedial legislation in order to take our recess?

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator from California was not here when I previously discussed the same contingency to which he is now referring, namely, if the President failed to sign the bill.

Mr. PHELAN. Well, Mr. President, if the President fails to sign it, of course it would not be law, and the joint resolution of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN] would be very helpful in the administration of the Agricultural Department.

Mr. McCUMBER. Then, what becomes of all the results of a three months' continuous battle in reference to the price of wheat?

Mr. PHELAN. Well, the gentlemen who advocated that rise in the price of wheat will be among the unmourned minority. There must be a majority and a minority, and the minority will have failed to have impressed their views upon the President and upon two-thirds of the Congress which under the Constitution may override the veto.

Mr. McCUMBER. No; it would be the majority that would be yielding, and not the minority. I think we may assume, as has been suggested by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN], that the President will sign the bill. It passed by a very heavy majority both in the Senate and in the other House, and by a unanimous vote in the Senate this afternoon. The proposition proposing to fix the price at $2.40 a bushel for wheat passed by a vote, I think, of 150 to about 106 in the House of Representatives. With that very positive sentiment impressed upon this legislation, it seems to me that I have a right to assume that the President will sign it. Then, if the President does sign it, and he should also sign this joint resolution, we shall have two appropriations duplicating each other for that portion of July, 1918, which will have expired before the Agricultural appropriation bill shall be signed. It is for that reason I say it ought to go out.

On the other hand, if the President should fail to approve the bill which passed by such a heavy majority, then we shall be placed in this position: After three months of labor in securing an agreement upon the price of the only commodity the price of which has been fixed by the administration, we nevertheless allow it to fail, because the President already has an appropriation to take care of the Agricultural Department for the fiscal year of 1919, and thus we defeat the entire Agricultural appropriation bill and take the 1918 Agricultural appropriation bill as a basis for 1919.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, my only object is to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that if this motion prevails it puts the President in the position of either having to approve the Agricultural appropriation bill or leave the Agricultural Department without the means of maintenance for the fiscal year. I see in it an attempt to take away freedom of action from the Executive.

I have no particular interest in the measure itself, but I think it would be a safeguard to pass the joint resolution moved by the Senator from Virginia and to leave the President free. If he approves of one he must disapprove of the other. So there need be no danger of duplication.

Mr. McCUMBER. Well, Mr. President, that certainly is a unique method of legislation, by sending to the President two bills upon the same subject and saying to him, "You veto the one and you approve the other." Why not send him three or four or a dozen bills, all representing the views of minorities, and let him take his choice between the bills? It would be just as sensible as sending him two bills to-day covering any portion of the same period; and that is exactly what we are doing.

Mr. PHELAN. Should I be in a position—and I am in no such position—to tell the Senator from North Dakota that the President in all probability will veto the Agricultural appropriation bill, would he then consent to the joint resolution submitted by the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. McCUMBER. We do not have to consent to something, I am thinking. We would have to do something. I do not, however, think that there is any majority or any minority that is going to prevent the Agricultural Department from having sufficient money to take care of their demands; but I say that we ought to send one bill to the President now—we have passed that bill—and let the President sign it or return it without his signature. If he returns it, then it will be time enough to report some other measure.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

Mr. GORE. Does not the Senator from North Dakota think, if we send two bills to the President covering the same object, making appropriations for the same department, that that is a sort of invitation to either veto one or the other of the bills? There can be no doubt that if the President should veto the regular Agricultural appropriation bill either it would be passed through both Houses without the wheat amendment or a continuing joint resolution would be passed making provision for the Department of Agriculture. Nobody could afford to resist one or the other of those proceedings; but to pass both bills and send both bills to him at once as competing measures looks a little like an invitation to veto the regular appropriation bill, because we shall already have made provision for a contingency which would arise in case he did veto the Agricultural appropriation bill.

I have no disposition to exert any coercion on the President; I do not think we could, if we desired to do so; and certainly we do not desire to do so. The only point I make is that sending both measures is a sort of invitation to veto the regular appropriation bill; and this joint resolution should go over until he does veto the regular bill.

Mr. McCUMBER. It is not only an invitation, but we would be compelling him to veto one or else duplicate the appropriations.

Mr. GORE. If the pending joint resolution should be laid aside until the President vetoes the regular appropriation bill, if he should veto it, then I would not object to the appropriations for the Agricultural Department being included in the joint resolution, because we must meet this exigency when it arises. I do not think it has arisen yet.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota.

The amendment was rejected.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the joint resolution to be read a third time.

The joint resolution was read the third time and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "Joint resolution making appropriations for certain necessary operations of the Government and of the District of Columbia for the months of July and August, 1918, and for other purposes."

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by G. F. Turner, one of its clerks, announced that the House agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 12600) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, and prior fiscal years, on account of war expenses, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the House agrees to the further conference asked for by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 61, and 83 to the bill (H. R. 11692) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and for other purposes, and had appointed Mr. SISSON, Mr. MCANDREWS, and Mr. DAVIS managers at the further conference on the part of the House.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. 12600) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, and prior fiscal years, on account of war expenses, and for other purposes, and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

CORRUPT PRACTICES.

Mr. GERRY. I renew my previous request that Senate bill 3438 be taken up for consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. SMOOT. I desire to say to the Senator from Rhode Island that there are a number of Senators who are interested in that bill, and who have amendments to offer to it, who are absent from the city. No one expected the bill to be taken up at this time, and I do not see why the Senator should make the request, inasmuch as there is no pressing necessity for the immediate passage of the bill.

Mr. GERRY. I think there is necessity for the passage of this bill, and I do not see how there can be objection to it. The only objections that have been raised are that the scope of the bill should be enlarged. I do not believe that there is anything more important to this body than the purity of its elections. It seems to me that the bill is of great importance; that it should pass before the recess, so that there should be an opportunity for the House to act upon it. For that reason I urge its passage.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, this is a Senate bill. If it should pass the Senate to-day in the absence of the Senators who desire to discuss it and offer amendments to it, it will have to go to the House and be acted upon there. If Congress takes a recess to-day, that will be impossible; and if it does not take a recess to-day, then the bill can be taken up when the Senators who are now absent are present. I repeat, there is no necessity for this bill, and there will be nothing gained, I will say to the Senator, by having it passed now. I do not think that advantage ought to be taken of those Senators who are absent.

Mr. GERRY. I do not think there is any advantage being taken of any Senator who is absent. The only objection which has been raised to the bill is on the part of those who claim that the bill should go further in its scope; they did not object to the principle involved in the bill. I repeat, I think the matter is of the utmost importance, and for that reason I renew my request for unanimous consent.

Mr. SMOOT. I shall have to object to unanimous consent.

Mr. GERRY. Then, Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 3438.

Mr. SMOOT. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hitchcock	Nugent	Smith, Ariz.
Bankhead	Johnson, Cal.	Overman	Smith, Ga.
Borah	Johnson, S. Dak.	Phelan	Smith, Md.
Chamberlain	Jones, N. Mex.	Pittman	Smoot
Culberson	Jones, Wash.	Poindexter	Sterling
Curtis	Kellogg	Pomerene	Sutherland
Fletcher	Lenroot	Ransdell	Swanson
France	Lewis	Reed	Trammell
Gerry	McKellar	Saulsbury	Underwood
Gore	Myers	Shafroth	Vardaman
Guion	Nelson	Sheppard	Walsh
Harding	New	Sherman
Henderson	Norris	Shields

Mr. LEWIS. I desire to announce that the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM] is detained on official business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Fifty Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. GERRY. I renew my motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 3438.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 3438) to prevent corrupt practices in the election of Senators, Representatives, or Delegates in Congress, which had been reported from the Committee on Privileges and Elections with an amendment.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill has been read. The Secretary will state the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment was, on page 1, line 8, after the word "vote," to insert the words "or to vote for or against any particular candidate," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That whoever shall promise, offer, or give, or cause to be promised, offered, or given, any money or other things of value, or shall make or tender any contract, undertaking, obligation, gratuity, or security for the payment of money or for the delivery or conveyance of anything of value to any person or persons, either to vote or withhold their vote or to vote for or against any particular candidate at any general or special election for Senator or Representative or Delegate in Congress, shall be fined not more than $1,000 or imprisoned not more than one year, or both.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I should like to know what the words "particular candidate" mean? Do they mean that a candidate in any particular State is to fall under the provisions of the proposed law, while a candidate in another State is not to be affected by it? Why not say "vote for or against any candidate"?

Mr. GERRY. I will say to the Senator from Utah that that amendment proposing to incorporate the words "or to vote for or against any particular candidate" is an amendment reported by the committee which had charge of the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. I know that. I wanted to know why the committee used the word "particular."

Mr. GERRY. I do not know; I can not answer that question.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, the amendment was suggested in that form. I do not know that there is any special reason why the word "particular" should either remain in or be left out.

Mr. SMOOT. Then, I move that the word "particular" be stricken from the committee amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In the committee amendment it is proposed to strike out the word "particular" before the word "candidate."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I think that is the only committee amendment. I now move to insert in line 9, after the word "any," the words "primary or," so that it will read:

Withhold their vote or to vote for or against any candidate at any primary or general or special election for Senator or Representative or Delegate in Congress.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I do not believe that is a good amendment. I do not see that primary elections ought to be under the control of the Federal authorities in any way. Primary elections are based purely upon State law and State action, and it seems to me that it is not proper to extend this legislation to the primaries.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, everyone knows that the primary election in a Southern State is equivalent to the election of whoever is nominated at a primary election. What is the use of the proposed law so far as the Southern States are concerned unless we put in the word "primary"? If we are going to have a law to apply in this country to the election of Senators, let it apply to all the States and not eliminate a certain section of the country. I am in favor of a law that will apply to all the States alike.

Mr. FLETCHER. This bill does apply to all the States.

Mr. SMOOT. It does in the case of general elections, but the Senator knows there is nothing to a general election in the Southern States for a Senator or a Member of the other House; he knows the result is determined in the primaries; he knows that at the primaries is where money is spent; and he knows that is where the political work is done. That is not so in the Northern States nor in the Western States. If this principle is to apply to all elections, let it apply to primary elections in the Southern States. I can not see why there should be any objection to the amendment, for, if the principle is right, it ought to be made to apply to all elections.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WALSH. I will wait until the Senator concludes.

Mr. SMOOT. I offer the amendment in good faith, thinking that, if Senators are converted to the principle—and I have no objection to the principle—it should apply to all elections, and, therefore, I hope that the amendment will be adopted by the Senate. Then there will be no question about the passage of the bill, in my opinion.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I feel as if I should like to appeal to the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] to withdraw his objection to the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT]. The legislation is very, very much needed, indeed, and I can not conceive that any representative from any State would object to a prosecution for bribery committed at a primary election at which candidates for the Senate or the House of Representatives are to be nominated. The act is very restricted in its scope; it is confined to the crime of bribery only; and I want to appeal very earnestly to my associates on this side of the Chamber not to interpose any objections that are not vital to this legislation, which is, as some of us happen to know, very much needed, indeed.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Montana permit a question?

Mr. WALSH. I yield.

Mr. KING. Why can not the States deal with this question? Most of them have statutes in regard to elections, penal statutes, statutes dealing with fraudulent voting, with bribery. Why intrude the Federal Government into the States when the States are competent to deal with their own affairs?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I am very sure the Senator from Rhode Island would be able to satisfy the Senator from Utah from the history of his own State as to how inadequate is the provision made by the State statute, and, worse than that, how utterly inadequate is the execution of the State statute involving the question of the election of a United States Senator.

Mr. President, when the Constitution was originally adopted there was comparatively little occasion for a provision in it concerning elections, because only a Member of the House of Representatives in the Federal system was the subject of election by the vote of the people. But, Mr. President, we live in a different age. It was not a long time until the President of the United States became virtually elected by the electors of the various States, and notwithstanding the machinery of the Electoral College we all recognize that he is now in fact elected by the people of the United States. Moreover, we have brought about the election of Senators by the people of the various States; so that it becomes a matter of very great moment to the people of my State whether there are pure elections in every other State in the Union, and it becomes a matter of very great consequence to us who are permitted to vote in every other State in the Union. Therefore, if the elections of Senators and Representatives are corrupted in any one State by bribery, it is a matter of the most profound importance to the people of my State, because they are obliged to submit to laws which may perchance become effective by the vote of Senators or Representatives chosen by corrupt means in any particular State.

Undoubtedly there are laws against bribery in the various States; but those who have had experience in politics—and the Senator from Utah need consult only his own experience—will recognize that in the States where this statute is necessary, the parties who make themselves amenable to the local statutes ordinarily control the machinery of government, so that the law is not executed and the trials are not had. Such a condition of affairs prevailed in my State until no very remote period in its history; and though we had the most drastic corrupt-practices act in our State, it was a dead letter in the very counties in which a corrupt-practices act was most needed, simply because those who handled the political machinery likewise handled the prosecuting attorneys and the machinery by which the juries were assembled in those counties.

So, Mr. President, it will not do to say that we can afford to leave to the laws of States the whole matter of guarding the purity of elections of United States Senators and Representatives in Congress, and the President of the United States himself.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I want to indorse very heartily everything that the distinguished Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] has said upon this subject. As one member of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, I consented to report this bill as we did because I hoped we could get it through without any opposition; but, as the question has come up, I want to say that I feel that this legislation ought to apply to primary as well as to general elections.

In answer to the suggestion made by the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], allow me to say that in the election of 1916 in Hamilton County, Ohio, there were about 100 indictments returned by the Federal grand jury under the so-called conspiracy statute for corruption at the general election.

The Department of Justice was of the opinion that that statute was comprehensive enough to cover conspiracies for fraud in elections as well as other conspiracies. The United States Supreme Court just very recently reversed the convictions under that statute, and now it is as if there were no Federal election law relating to the election of Congressmen and Senators; and the condition in Hamilton County, Ohio, to-day is such that when it comes to an offense against the election laws of the State there can not be an indictment or a conviction, and if we can not get relief there we want it in the Federal courts.

It is quite true that there have been more of these frauds in every section of the country than we like to admit. I do not believe I have here the title of the case to which I referred, but it was an opinion delivered by Mr. Justice McReynolds very recently, and I had it incorporated in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on page 6948 on May 23, 1918, when this same bill was up for consideration.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, this bill is simply a bill to punish bribery of the vote; and I think the committee realized that it is just as important to include primary elections as it is to include the general elections. Many of the States do not have statutes providing penalties for the corruption of voters in the primary elections for Senators and Representatives. Many of the State laws apply only to State officers and county officers and municipal officers, and the penal clauses do not apply to primary elections for Senators and Representatives. Several of those have come to my attention.

I do not care whether it is a close State or whether it is not a close State. Everybody realizes that the purity of a primary election, which to-day is held under the sanction of law all over this country, is just as important as the purity of the general election, if not more so, and this statute is a simple statute against the bribery of a voter. I can not see any reason why it should not apply both to primary and to general elections, and I am in favor of it.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I agree with those who think that the word "primary" ought to be inserted in the bill, and I am in favor of it not because of any particular application to any particular section of the country. It is true, as the Senator from Utah says, that in some parts of the country the primary is perhaps more important and more controlling in the ultimate result than in other States; but, nevertheless, it is just as essential that the word "primary" be inserted for the Northern States as it is for the Southern States.

Of late years there has come to be more money expended in primary elections, often, than in the final elections. It is a practice which obtains pretty generally now to expend a very considerable amount of money in primary elections. Of course, I am not authorized to say that any specific acts of corruption have taken place; but where there is so much money expended it is well to have the matter thoroughly controlled by law, and I am therefore very much in favor, if the bill is to be passed at all, of inserting the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah, because the entire election should be protected, from beginning to end. In other words, if you can corrupt an election to get a man on the ticket, you have corrupted the entire election, because it necessarily follows that the first step will be followed up, to the extent that they may to the final consummation.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Idaho if he has any doubt as to the power of Congress to legislate with reference to the primary?

Mr. BORAH. No; I have not, with reference to the election of Senators and Representatives.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I can see, of course, how a distinction might be made. I was of the opinion myself that the power did exist, but I wanted to have the assurance of the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. I feel very certain that we have that power; and I may say here further that the time is not far distant, Mr. President, when the National Government is going to take over the control of elections to a very great extent—to a much greater extent than it has heretofore. At the conclusion of the Civil War we passed what is known as the fifteenth amendment, and in a few weeks, I am told, we are going to pass another amendment, known as the woman-suffrage amendment. Those two amendments, together with the fact that we now have a certain power over the election of Senators and Representatives, will not only give the National Government control of the elections in the States, but it will impose upon the National Government the duty of controlling the elections in the States. We might just as well understand now as later that the National Government is going to assume practically complete control over the elections. Wherever a Senator is elected or a Representative is elected, and you control that election by reason of that fact, you will as a practical fact control the elections of State officers. We should not blind ourselves to the fact that these amendments to the Constitution widening and extending the power of the National Government over the franchise will lead to complete national control over elections.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. KELLOGG. I wish to suggest to the Senator from New Mexico that under the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States there can not be the slightest doubt not only that Congress has the power to punish frauds on primary elections, but to enact a primary-election law. In fact, some States—at least one that I know of—have held that only Congress can do it, and that the State law providing for the regulation of a primary for Senators was unconstitutional. I do not think that was good law in the absence of a statute by Congress which occupies the entire field, but there can not be any doubt of the power of Congress to regulate the election of Senators and Representatives.

Mr. BORAH. I agree with that view.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, the manifest purpose of this bill has my very hearty approval. If the penalties imposed were limited in their application to the man or woman elected to Congress, I should not object to it; but I am a little afraid of any bill or any law that gives the Federal Government authority to interfere with State elections. We had enough of that legislative poison in the South during the days of reconstruction, and I for one do not want any more of it. I wish it understood that I am very much opposed to anything that even savors of fraud in election. I am opposed to a man occupying a seat in this Chamber or in the other House whose title to his seat is in the least tainted with dishonesty. This bill, of course, is not fairly subject to the criticism that my friend the able Senator from Utah has made of it. It is not intended to control in any way the morals of the people of the States, but its purpose, as I understand it, is to conserve and make certain the morals of the legislative body of the Government. I am opposed to the use of money in elections, either general or primary elections, and I shall never vote to permit a man to occupy a seat in this Chamber as long as I am a Member of this body, whose title to his place is in the slightest degree vitiated by fraud. Now, if the bill shall be amended so as to provide that no man or woman shall hold a seat in the Congress of the United States who has secured his or her election by methods condemned in this bill, it will have my very cordial support.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. VARDAMAN. I yield.

Mr. POMERENE. As each body is made the judge of the election and qualification of its own Members, we can expel from the Senate, and the House of Representatives can expel from the House any Member whose election is brought about by fraud.

Mr. VARDAMAN. That is true. I am perfectly familiar with that prerogative which belongs to the Senate, and the Senator from Ohio has not given me any information that is not known to every page in this Chamber. The House and the Senate are judges of the qualifications of their Members. There is no question but that the provisions of this bill will place all State elections for Members of Congress and the United States Senate under Federal control. I think the power had better be reserved to the States where it has been exercised with prudence for more than a hundred years.

Now, Mr. President, I repeat I do not wish to permit by any act of omission or commission a man to serve in the Congress of the United States who has been elected by methods condemned by this bill. I would not have any man occupy a seat in this body or in the other body of this Congress whose right to that seat is tainted with fraud or any of the acts condemned in this bill. If the penalties in the proposed law shall be limited to the man corruptly elected to the House or the Senate, I shall be very glad to support it, but it is a dangerous experiment to take from the States the authority to punish election frauds and vest it in the Federal Government. The States can be relied upon to punish election frauds committed in their respective jurisdictions.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I have no doubt in the world, and I can not conceive how there can be a doubt arising in the mind of any person, of the right and the authority of Congress to legislate upon this subject. Congress having already legislated upon it and prescribed that no election shall be held valid in the face of fraud, and invalidating an election where such election has been secured through fraud, I can not see any objection to a further amendment of the law punishing those who are guilty of the fraud.

But, Mr. President, what I really am more interested in at this time is to ascertain whether my confidence in self-government must be shattered; whether or not it is true that there are whole counties in the United States where law can not be enforced. If I understood the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] and the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY], each of them announced that a certain number of indictments had been returned against citizens of two different counties in two different States, but nothing was said as to whether or not those indictments had been followed up by convictions. I am asking whether it is really true that those Senators seek to come to Congress to get a Federal law because they are unable to enforce the laws of their States in counties in their States?

Mr. GERRY. In answer to the Senator from North Dakota I desire to say that, unfortunately, in my State the authorities have not prosecuted violations of the election laws. In the history of that State we have practically had no convictions, although bribery has been rampant. It was not the fault of juries; the fault was in the fact that no indictments were had. When Federal aid was invoked 56 indictments were had, and that fact speaks for itself; in other words——

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator speaks of indictments. Were there convictions under those indictments?

Mr. GERRY. In other words, the Federal prosecuting official was able to obtain 56 indictments.

Mr. McCUMBER. Well, how about convictions? An indictment amounts to nothing unless there is a conviction.

Mr. GERRY. It was impossible to obtain convictions because the Supreme Court of the United States said that the Federal Government did not have jurisdiction.

Mr. McCUMBER. Well, I am trying to get at the real root of the trouble.

Mr. GERRY. There was no Federal statute.

Mr. McCUMBER. Is it true that in Rhode Island the State laws can not be enforced in a county in the State by the people of the State and the officials of the State?

Mr. GERRY. I will say to the Senator that the officials of the State do not enforce the election laws.

Mr. McCUMBER. Do not enforce the laws?

Mr. GERRY. Do not enforce the laws.

Mr. McCUMBER. Let me ask the Senator, then, is there not provision in the State laws or the constitution of the State for the removal of an officer who fails to perform his duties? May not the governor remove him, and, if there is no provision for removal by the executive, is there not some other process that can be instituted by the people themselves to get rid of an official who will not perform his duty?

Mr. GERRY. The Senator evidently does not understand the constitution of Rhode Island.

Mr. McCUMBER. I admit that I do not.

Mr. GERRY. The situation is this: Apparently the State officials are not able to find evidence of bribery; at least they do not prosecute for such offenses, although the Federal officials had no difficulty in securing such evidence and obtaining indictments. In our State we are working under a rotten borough system, as bad as that which existed in England before the reform bill of 1832. Under that system a small minority of the population is able to control the government of the State, and the political party in the State, which has been in power for many, many years, is in power, in my opinion, on account of its control of that minority vote. When the political party in control is not able to see that we have purity in elections and is not able to give us the reforms that we need in the State, then it is time that we should seek aid from the Federal Government. That is why I have introduced this bill. The fact remains, as I have heretofore stated, that, owing to the rotten borough system, a very few towns are able to control the State senate, and by so doing control the government of the State.

Mr. McCUMBER. It seems to me, Mr. President, that the Senator challenges either the integrity or the good sense of the people of the State, because, if they have good sense and also have integrity, there can be no possibility but that they can remove the bad conditions of which the Senator is complaining.

After all, it is a self-governing State; the power rests in the people themselves, and, if they have a knowledge of the situation and if they have the moral sense back of that knowledge, I confess I can see no reason on earth why they themselves can not apply the remedy.

Mr. GERRY. In reply to the Senator, if the majority ruled in Rhode Island and if the majority had the authority to make the laws, there is no doubt in my mind that these conditions would not exist; but unfortunately we are suffering from minority rule and from an archaic constitution, which was adopted in the forties, a constitution so framed that it is practically impossible to amend it. In order to amend the constitution a proposed amendment must be passed twice by both houses of the State legislature before being submitted to the people; but no amendment can go through, of course, if the State senate is against it, and the State senate is elected by a minority of the people. So, under the control of the political machine in power in that State, it is possible to prevent constitutional amendment, although the people in every section of the State are crying aloud for it and the majority of the people are highly in favor of it.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I shall be glad, indeed, to do anything or assist in any way toward relieving conditions such as the Senator from Rhode Island has mentioned; and I shall, out of consideration for him, if not for other considerations, certainly refrain from any obstructive tactics as to this proposed legislation.

I wish, however, to say, in reply to what the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] suggested when I objected to his amendment, that it is scarcely necessary for me to insist that I am just as much opposed to bribery at elections as he or any other man can be. I am perfectly willing that bribery at elections shall be prohibited all over the country and at every election; and I desire to see that done. But I resent strongly the implication that, because I object to this amendment, therefore the South, particularly that portion of it which I have the honor in some part to stand for here, wants to be left free to commit bribery at elections just as the people there may please to do. I resent the intimation that by reason of opposing this amendment I am in favor of or in sympathy with the practice which the bill condemns; and I must be permitted to urge some experience which has passed into history in connection with the Federal courts interfering or intervening in the case of alleged congressional election frauds.

It is perfectly well known that not a great many years ago—I will say generally during the McKinley administration—a man was appointed a Federal district judge for the southern district of Florida for the reason and with the understanding that he was at once to organize his court and proceed to prosecute people in a certain congressional district in that State for alleged election frauds; that after his appointment he did organize that court, and they made a cost mill of it for the benefit of the marshal and the clerk, and from three to five hundred citizens were indicted, hauled from their homes, forced to give bond and employ attorneys, and go to expense to answer the indictments laid against them by a Republican district attorney, at the instance of a Republican judge, served by a Republican marshal, in order to carry out the pledge of that judge that he would proceed at once to have people in that State prosecuted for alleged election frauds.

Mr. REED. How were the juries secured?

Mr. FLETCHER. After these people were called before that court juries were ordered to be summoned. This United States marshal wrote to the deputies throughout the district: "I want you to summon so many men from each of your counties in this district to serve on the juries, and these men must be true and tried Republicans." That was the written instruction given by the marshal to his deputies throughout that district—"Every man you summon to serve on this jury must be a true and tried Republican."

I submit, Mr. President, that if there is one crime greater than that of stuffing the ballot box, it is the crime of stuffing the jury box. That was actually done in that district. It turned out that out of these 400 or 500 indictments, as I recall now, not a single person was convicted; but they were persecuted as well as prosecuted, put to enormous expense, and hounded and pursued for months and months.

Mr. President, I do not believe that situation will ever arise again. I believe, candidly, that we have passed beyond it. I do not believe there will ever again be such a partisan Attorney General who would outline such a scheme and plan as that, or that there will ever again be a man who will enter into an undertaking of that sort, or that a court will ever again be organized in that way in any part of the country. I really think we have gotten beyond it; but I mention it as one of the possibilities and one of the dangers under legislation of this kind, and I mention it as an experience demonstrating the kind of persecution and tyranny and oppression that could be practiced under legislation of this sort.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, the occurrences in Florida to which he refers must have been before the present system of selecting United States juries was in vogue; were they not? Now, of course, the juries are selected by commissioners, one of whom is the clerk of the court, and another of opposite political opinion, appointed by the judge, and they are selected, of course, in a nonpartisan or rather in a bipartisan way; so that such things could not occur now.

Mr. FLETCHER. I believe that at that time the names were drawn from a box; but it was claimed that the list from the box was exhausted, and then they had a right to summon men from the district at large, and I think they do so yet, even under that system.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I have had some such experience as the Senator describes in my own State when juries have been exhausted and talesmen were summoned to try political cases, and I sympathize with his statement of the outrages which have been committed; but that was not in regard to such an offense as bribery, which I regard as the meanest, lowest thing to which parties can resort. That was with respect to the very partisan operations of the old supervisors and United States deputy marshals, when they were attempting to control elections by force. To my mind, force is a much more respectable method by which to control elections than bribery. Bribery has been denominated in the Democratic platforms in my State for years as treason to the country, and I so regard it; and I am in entire sympathy with this particular provision which the Senator from Rhode Island is trying to have put in the United States laws. I do not think anybody can be hurt by this.

If I thought that under the guise of this act the United States would attempt to control State elections my opinion would coincide precisely with that of the Senator from Florida; but this bill is so narrow in its scope, and it is such a mean, miserable, treasonable thing that we are trying to put a stop to and trying to obtain an additional forum in which to try these cases that I am in accord with the Senator from Rhode Island in this matter.

Mr. FLETCHER. I condemn quite as strongly as does the Senator from Delaware the practice of bribery. What I have had to say has been by way of indicating the danger of putting into the hands of the Federal courts the duty of enforcing the law with respect to the elections of Congressmen and Senators in this way, and I instanced our experience of some years ago—which was most unhappy and which, as I say frankly, I do not expect ever will occur again—as an illustration of the danger that is involved in legislation of this kind. I rather prefer to leave the administration and enforcement of these laws to the States, respectively; and I believe that that power left to the States and the steps that we have taken here with regard to the amount of expense allowed and the control over the election of its Members that each body of Congress has gives us sufficient protection.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, if this bill can be voted on right away, I have no objection; but it is now 5 o'clock, and it is Saturday afternoon, and it seems to me that we might take an adjournment.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, will not the Senator allow us to have a vote? I think we can vote on the matter. So far as I know, the discussion is practically finished; at least, I hope so, and I hope that we may have a vote very soon.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ASHURST in the chair). The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Cummins	Gore	Jones, N. Mex.
Bankhead	Curtis	Guion	Jones, Wash.
Beckham	Dillingham	Harding	Kellogg
Borah	Fletcher	Hitchcock	Kendrick
Chamberlain	France	Johnson, Cal.	King
Culberson	Gerry	Johnson, S. Dak.	Lenroot

Lewis	Penrose	Sheppard	Thompson
McCumber	Phelan	Shields	Trammell
McKellar	Pittman	Simmons	Underwood
Martin	Poindexter	Smith, Ariz.	Vardaman
New	Pomerene	Smith, Ga.	Warren
Norris	Ransdell	Smoot
Nugent	Reed	Sterling
Overman	Saulsbury	Sutherland

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to announce the absence of the senior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL]. I will let this announcement remain for the day.

Mr. McKELLAR. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence on official business of the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. KIRBY].

Mr. PITTMAN. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence on official business of the junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. HENDERSON].

Mr. LEWIS. May the RECORD show the absence of the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES], occasioned by personal illness?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-three Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Rhode Island how he interprets the following language of the bill, reading lines 7, 8, and 9:

for the delivery or conveyance of anything of value to any person or persons, either to vote or withhold their vote or to vote for or against any particular candidate at any general or special election for Senator.

Would not that language make any person guilty of an offense who voted at a primary or special election at which a Senator or Representative or Delegate in Congress was voted for, even though the person for whom he voted was a State official? It seems to me that that language is so broad that this statute would penalize a man for bribery in connection with any candidate, whether Federal or State.

Mr. GERRY. I will say to the Senator from Utah that I do not think so.

Mr. KING. I invite the attention of the Senate to the language. It seems to me that it is susceptible of no other construction:

That whoever shall promise, offer, or give, or cause to be promised, offered, or given, any money or other things of value, or shall make or tender any contract, undertaking, obligation, gratuity, or security for the payment of money or for the delivery or conveyance of anything of value to any person or persons, either to vote or withhold their vote or to vote for or against any particular candidate at any general or special election—

That would mean a justice of the peace, a constable, and so on.

Mr. GERRY. I will say to the Senator that the word "particular" was stricken out, as I understand, so that it now reads:

For or against any candidate at any general or special election for Senator or Representative or Delegate in Congress.

The legislation applies purely to Federal officials, and, being a criminal statute, will be construed strictly.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. KING. Just a minute; let me reply. I understand the rule of criminal construction, of course, that penal statutes are construed strictly; but the language as found in the bill would make it an offense if the bribery was in connection with some local State official.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield just a minute?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. THOMPSON. Permit me to call attention to the fact that the Senator read down to the real controlling clause, and that is:

Any general or special election for Senator or Representative or Delegate in Congress.

I simply wanted to call that fact to the attention of the Senator.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the Senator from Kansas is mistaken, of course. The language covers any person who may be voted for at any general or special election; and the Senator knows that at general elections officials of the States are voted for, the same as a Member of Congress is voted for.

Mr. PITTMAN and Mr. THOMPSON addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. KING. I yield to the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. PITTMAN. I think possibly the construction of the Senator from Utah might be the construction of a court, but by inversion of the language you will find that it is not so, if you should read it as follows:

To any person or persons, either to vote or withhold their vote or to vote for or against any particular candidate for Senator or Representative—

And then place after that—at any general or special election.

Mr. KING. Oh, of course, if you indulge in inversions——

Mr. PITTMAN. I offer that as an amendment.

Mr. GERRY. I shall be very glad to accept that amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. KING. I yield to either of the Senators. I just wanted to call attention to the language of the bill as it is drawn now. It would make it an offense to deal with some local election.

Mr. PITTMAN. I offer the amendment suggested.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is an amendment pending, which the Secretary will now state.

The SECRETARY. The pending amendment is the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], in line 9, before the word "general" to insert the words "primary or," so that it will read "at any primary or general or special election for Senator or Representative or Delegate in Congress."

Mr. BORAH. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll, and Mr. ASHURST responded in the affirmative.

Mr. GERRY. I am willing to accept that amendment.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, a point of order. The roll call is proceeding.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. One response has been made.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I rise to a point of order. The Senator from Rhode Island accepted that amendment when it was proposed by the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Nevada did not offer the amendment. The Senator from Utah offered the amendment and it was not accepted.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The offer was made.

Mr. NORRIS. I make the point of order the debate is out of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will proceed with the roll call.

Mr. FLETCHER. May I ask what the question is?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question may be stated. The roll call is the only thing that is now in order.

Mr. BANKHEAD. There was so much confusion in the Chamber we do not know what we are to vote on.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will again state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. The pending question is the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], in line 9, before the word "general" to insert the words "primary or," so that, if amended, it will read "at any primary or general or special election for Senator or Representative or Delegate in Congress."

Mr. BORAH. Question!

The Secretary resumed the calling of the roll.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (when his name was called). The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX], with whom I am paired, is absent. I transfer my pair to the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. KIRBY] and vote "yea."

Mr. CURTIS (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] to the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] and vote "yea."

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] and vote "nay."

Mr. GERRY (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS] and vote "yea."

Mr. SAULSBURY (when his name was called). I transfer my general pair with the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT] to the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] and vote "yea."

Mr. SMITH of Georgia (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] to the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] and vote "nay."

Mr. STERLING (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] to the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] and vote "yea."

Mr. THOMPSON (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN]. I am advised that he would vote as I do, and I will therefore vote. I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. HARDING (after having voted in the affirmative). I note that the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] did not respond. I have a general pair with that Senator. I therefore transfer my general pair to the junior Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY] and allow my vote to stand.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I desire to announce the absence of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] on account of illness in his family, and he requested me to ask that he be granted an indefinite leave of absence. I make that request now.

Mr. MYERS. I transfer my pair with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN] to the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] and vote "nay."

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. If my colleague [Mr. McNARY] were present, I am authorized to state that he would vote for this bill.

Mr. KENDRICK (after having voted in the affirmative). I observe that the senior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL], with whom I have a pair, is absent on official business, but it seems, from the best information I can obtain, that he would vote as I have voted on this question. So I will allow my vote to stand.

Mr. PENROSE (after having voted in the affirmative). I observe that the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] has not voted. I have a general pair with that Senator which I transfer to the junior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BAIRD] and let my vote stand.

Mr. DILLINGHAM (after having voted in the affirmative). I have already voted, but I observe that the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH], with whom I have a pair, has not voted. I therefore transfer my pair to my colleague [Mr. PAGE] and allow my vote to stand.

Mr. REED (after having voted in the affirmative). When I voted I neglected to announce the transfer of my pair. I announce the transfer of my pair with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] to the Senator from Missouri [Mr. WILFLEY] and allow my vote to stand.

Mr. PITTMAN. The junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. HENDERSON] is absent on official business. If present, I wish to state that he would vote for this bill.

Mr. McKELLAR. I desire to announce the absence of the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. KIRBY] on official business.

Mr. LEWIS. I desire to announce that the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] is detained by death in his family.

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] with the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH];

The Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. WOLCOTT];

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES];

The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS]; and

The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] with the Senator from Nevada [Mr. HENDERSON].

The result was announced—yeas 40, nays 10, as follows:

YEAS—40.

Ashurst	Harding	McKellar	Reed
Beckham	Hitchcock	New	Saulsbury
Borah	Johnson, Cal.	Norris	Shafroth
Chamberlain	Johnson, S. Dak.	Nugent	Sheppard
Cummins	Jones, N. Mex.	Penrose	Simmons
Curtis	Jones, Wash.	Phelan	Smoot
Dillingham	Kellogg	Pittman	Sterling
France	Kendrick	Poindexter	Sutherland
Gerry	Lenroot	Pomerene	Thompson
Gulon	Lewis	Ransdell	Warren

NAYS—10.

Bankhead	Myers	Smith, Ga.	Vardaman
Fletcher	Overman	Swanson
King	Smith, Ariz.	Trammell

NOT VOTING—45.

Baird	Hale	McNary	Townsend
Brandegee	Hardwick	Martin	Underwood
Calder	Henderson	Nelson	Wadsworth
Colt	Hollis	Owen	Walsh
Culberson	James	Page	Watson
Fall	Kenyon	Robinson	Weeks
Fernald	Kirby	Sherman	Wilfley
Frelinghuysen	Knox	Shields	Williams
Gallinger	La Follette	Smith, Md.	Wolcott
Goff	Lodge	Smith, Mich.
Gore	McCumber	Smith, S. C.
Gronna	McLean	Thomas

So Mr. SMOOT's amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PITTMAN. So that there may be no doubt in regard to the construction of this matter and so that the objection of the Senator from Utah may be entirely removed and it may appear that this bill deals only with the election of Senators and Representatives in Congress, I ask that the language of the bill be inverted, and I offer this amendment for that purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. Strike out the words "at any primary or general or special election," in lines 9 and 10, and insert the same after the word "Congress," in line 11.

"SEC. 5. GEORGE E. CHAMBERLAIN,
G. M. HITCHCOCK,
F. E. WARREN,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
S. H. DENT, Jr.,
W. J. FIELDS,
JULIUS KAHN,
Managers on the part of the House.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report is before the Senate.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I move that the conference report be adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Before that is done I wish to ask the Senator about an amendment. I wish to ask the Senator what was done with amendment numbered 52, which relates to the question of furnishing uniforms to officers.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The conferees of the House positively refused to accept that amendment and there was nothing for us to do but to recede or bring the bill back with a disagreement, and the Senate conferees did not think that they ought to hold the bill up on that or some other amendment.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I wish to ask the Senator, if he can give the information, to tell the Senate what objections were offered to the amendment?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I will say to the Senator that it passed the Senate once as a separate measure and the bill went over to the House, and they tabled the bill in its original form. Later the same amendment was proposed and added to the Military Academy appropriation bill, and the House conferees on that bill refused to accept it, as the committee had refused to report out the original bill. It was added to this measure, and the House conferees again refused to accept it, notwithstanding the fact that the Senate conferees held out for it as long as there was a possible chance to get it in. They gave as a reason, amongst others, that the Quartermaster's Department is already furnishing these uniforms to officers at cost. The Government has practically commandeered the cloth of which the uniforms are made, so that they control the price, anyhow.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The Senator understands that the War Department only goes so far as to furnish the cloth at cost. They do not furnish the uniforms at cost. The cloth is furnished them, and then the soldiers must make all arrangements about making it into suits. They have to get the trimmings that are not furnished by the department.

I wish to say to the Senator I am satisfied the Senator has done all he can do. The Senate has acted, as he says, three times. What I am trying to get really are the reasons, if I can get them, why the amendment was not accepted. I certainly can not see any reason in the present situation.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The Senator knows I favor the proposition.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I know that.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I have steadily favored the proposition whenever it was here; but we have encountered the same difficulty when it comes into conference. The House positively refuses to accept the amendment.

Mr. JONES of Washington. It seems to me they ought to give their reasons for it; and if the Senator can give any in addition to those suggested, I should be very glad to know them.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. In the multitude of the amendments that were discussed, I do not recall any very specific reasons that were urged. Perhaps some of my colleagues on the committee will remember some of the reasons; possibly the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] does.

Mr. WARREN. The main reason stated was that upon inquiry at the department it was said that everything wanted would be furnished and legislation was unnecessary.

Mr. NORRIS. May I ask the Senator from Washington a question?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. I wish to ask the Senator if this proposition has ever been discussed and acted upon by the House itself? Has it not always been acted upon in committee?

Mr. JONES of Washington. The committee has never reported in the House.

Mr. NORRIS. So the House has never had an opportunity to pass it?

Mr. JONES of Washington. It has not.

Mr. NORRIS. I understand we passed the bill separately?

Mr. JONES of Washington. We did.

Mr. NORRIS. It died in committee, did it not?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. It was put as an amendment on the Military Academy appropriation bill, and that went out in conference without getting into the House, and it was put on this bill and has gone out in the same way. It seems to me that on some of these appropriation bills we ought to have rejected the conference report in order to get it into the House. It is hardly fair when the Senate has passed it three different times through the Senate that when it gets into conference it is always thrown out without getting it far enough to allow the House itself to pass upon it.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator, of course, would hardly expect a disagreement on this one item in a bill as important as this one?

Mr. NORRIS. I am not speaking of this particular bill as much as I am of the other bills. I agree with the Senator from Washington. I heard him when he first started on this proposition, and I have followed him along. I myself can not see any reason on earth why this provision should not be in the law. It is certainly a hardship on a great many of the soldiers to be compelled to submit as they must submit, if I understand the facts. If there are any reasons why, I should like to hear them. I have never yet had anything suggested to me that appeared to me of any consequence as an objection to this kind of legislation. I dislike to see it thrown out in this way.

Mr. WARREN. As the Senator knows, the conferees debate those points and insist the best they can. Finally it comes to a parliamentary situation. When legislation is put on an appropriation bill that does not pertain specially to it as an appropriation bill proper, the House that puts it in must recede. When it was in the Military Academy bill the proposition naturally arose that it belonged in the larger and regular annual appropriation bill, because there was nothing in the Military Academy bill which rendered it germane. I think the chairman will bear me out that we strove very hard and continuously to keep it in this bill.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I have studied over this matter quite a good deal to see if I could find any good or just reason why we should not pass this legislation. I do not assume that I am more interested in our soldiers than is any other Member of the Senate or any Member of the House of Representatives; I do not assume that I am more interested in the officers in the Army than is any Member of the House or of the Senate. So I have wondered whether or not I have been too insistent on this matter. I have wondered whether or not I was wrong about it; but I have not been able to conceive of any good reason why this legislation should not be passed.

Some time ago, after the bill passed the Senate, it was referred to the House of Representatives, and the matter was taken up with the War Department. The chairman of the House committee sent me a copy of a letter that was received from the War Department, in which it was stated they could comply with the proposed act without any trouble, and made no objection whatever to it; but, on the contrary, rather indicated that they would like to have the authority, although they did not say so in so many words.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. May I say to the Senator that those gentlemen insisted that the very thing that the amendment proposes to do is now being done by the department? The Senator will remember that when the amendment was adopted in the Senate he had read into the RECORD a letter from Gen. Goethals which seems to carry out the statement which the House Members make.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I am going to refer to that.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Just a moment. Under the regulation which they have adopted, if some young man with more money than another wants to buy a high-priced uniform—or, rather, if he wants to have it made by an expensive tailor—he has that option; but if he does not feel able to do that, he will get the uniform at the cost price. The Senator will remember regulation No. 5, which reads:

(5) All orders for uniforms will be made through the office of the local quartermaster, who will have supervision over the contractor's agent. The cost of the uniform will be the contract price plus the cost of the cloth. Officers purchasing uniforms will pay the local quartermaster the same, who, in turn, will settle with the contractor.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes; they furnish the cloth at cost, and then they make contracts with the tailors and different establishments for making that cloth into the uniform, and the officer must pay that price of the cloth, together with the profit to the man making it up. It would be entirely different where the Government would furnish all these uniforms complete to its officers. It would not only get the cloth cheaper in bulk, but it could make it up into uniforms much cheaper than the men can get it made up in this locality and in that locality and made under this contract or made under some other contract. So I do not consider that a very valid reason, Mr. President.

Furthermore, the uniform is not all the equipment that the officer must furnish. In talking with one of the officers of the Quartermaster's Department the other day, he stated that the boots that the officers must have now cost about $35 a pair, which ought to be obtained for $18; in other words, every officer is now practically mulcted nearly $18 a pair on these boots.

Officers must also have watches; they are a part of their equipment; and I stated the other day what a member of the other House told me with reference to that matter. The War Department has prescribed the standard of watch which these officers must have; it is also provided that certain classes of watches will comply with the standard. Then the Member of the House told me—and he claimed to have it upon authority that he could not at all doubt—that in one of the camps in this country they have let the contract for watches of a certain kind at $21 a watch, and that the very same identical watches are sold at wholesale for use in the railroad business at $10 a watch. In other words, every officer who gets a watch—and he must have it—must pay $11 more than he ought to have to pay for it and $11 more than he would have to pay for it if the Government furnished such articles.

Then, Mr. President, the officer must buy his revolver. It seems to me to be really absurd to say that an officer in the Army of the United States must go out and buy the revolver with which he must fight as well as his side arms, and all that sort of thing. I have here a list of the different articles. I shall not take the time to read it, but I heretofore submitted to the Senate and had printed in the RECORD a statement of an officer who went from private business into this new Army of ours. I know him personally, and I can vouch for his integrity and for his honesty. He gave me a list of the equipment and uniform articles that he must get, the price that he had to pay for them, and the price for which they could be furnished by the quartermaster, according to the prices at which these things were actually furnished to men while in the training camps. It appears from that list that he had to pay about $300 more than what the Government could furnish them for.

Mr. President, what does that mean? Assuming that these officers have to pay about $200 more for their equipment and uniforms than the Government could furnish them for, it simply means that the officers of our Army are really profiteered upon to the extent of from $31,000,000 to $48,000,000 a year, assuming that they get one uniform or are equipped once a year; and I take it that many times they will be equipped oftener than that. We have in our Army now, I am informed by one of the members of the Military Committee, in round numbers about 160,000 officers; that it takes about 80,000 officers to the million men; and we expect to have an Army of 3,000,000 men. For 3,000,000 men that means 240,000 officers; and at $200 an officer that would be $48,000,000. I have no doubt that they would save more than this if the Government would furnish these uniforms and equipment to the officers at cost, as it furnishes them to the private, to the man in the ranks.

Mr. President, it seems to me it would be a very easy matter for our Quartermaster Department to take care of this in connection with furnishing the uniforms for the privates. The officers, compared with the vast aggregate of our Army, are few in number. I think it is a very liberal and conservative statement to make simply to allow them to be fitted out once in a year. They probably have to be fitted out two or three times a year.

Mr. President, I do not want to detain the Senate in connection with this matter; I know that we can not afford to hold up this great bill on this matter, and yet it is a very important thing. We are going to bring new men into the Army by the thousands in the very near future. We ought not to continue this treatment of the men who are offering their lives in defense of the country. Whenever I see an officer going about the streets wearing a uniform I can not help but think, "This man is not only willing to serve his country, to offer his life in its defense, but Congress has permitted somebody to profiteer in the furnishing of his uniform." We denounce profiteering and yet we calmly permit this preying upon our boys.

Mr. REED. What is the remedy for that which the Senator suggests?

Mr. JONES of Washington. The remedy that I suggest is that the Government furnish the officers their equipment and uniform.

Mr. REED. I mean, what does the Senator suggest at this time in this bill?

Mr. JONES of Washington. There is not any remedy on this bill, but I desire to present these facts in the hope that the bill that has heretofore passed the Senate will be considered in another body.

Mr. REED. I want to say to the Senator, without accurate and close knowledge as to the facts, that I am very much impressed with what he is saying; and I think the matter ought to be righted absolutely and promptly; but I am inquiring whether we can do it now?

Mr. JONES of Washington. We can not do it now, unless we reject this conference report; but while I have felt I have made myself a sort of nuisance in connection with this matter, I consider it of such importance that I feel justified in doing so. I feel justified in bringing the matter up here in the hope that some one somewhere else will take some interest in it. I have really been astonished that no one in another body seems to take any particular interest in the matter. As I said a while ago, I have really wondered whether or not I am wrong in the matter, or whether or not I am overzealous without reason; and yet the more I think about it the more unjust it seems to me is our action toward these men.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I should like to make an inquiry of the Senator. He has made a very striking statement of a situation which seems to be indefensible; and that is that officers are charged $10 more for a watch than the same watch can be bought for under other conditions. That savors very strongly of graft.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The Senator will remember that I made that statement upon the statement of a Member of the House to me; I do not know anything about the facts myself.

Mr. PENROSE. I have seen the same statement in the newspapers, and I should like to ask the chairman of the committee whether it is a fact.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I have no information in regard to it at all. This is the first time I ever heard the statement made.

Let me say in this connection that here is a bill that was discussed in the House for practically 10 days; it has been in conference for a week, and there were over 100 amendments involved. Now, it was just a question with the committee whether for one or two amendments we should hold up this great appropriation bill, which ought to have passed on the 15th of last month, whether we should remain in session another week in order to bring the House conferees to our view, or whether we should report it out and sacrifice some of the amendments which are not absolutely necessary to the prosecution of the war.

I am just as enthusiastic about this proposition as is the Senator from Washington. I think it is outrageous that this amendment could not be inserted in some bill; and if the Senator wants to send the bill back to conference, I will not interpose any serious objection, although I will say to the Senator that if it is referred back it will be a week or ten days before the bill gets out again.

Mr. JONES of Washington. No, Mr. President; I hope the Senator does not understand that I am complaining of him; I am not; I know the Senator has done all that he could do in the matter, and I am not going to ask that the conference report be rejected; I am not going to ask that it be sent back; but I am making this statement, as I said awhile ago, in the hope that some interest may be created somewhere else in regard to this matter which involves, as it seems to me, such a flagrant injustice.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, did I understand the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] to say a few moments ago that the matter which the Senator from Washington mentions has been corrected by regulations? I gather that such is the case from the remarks of the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. WARREN. In relation to what the Senator from Washington states on information, I am not going to enter into any discussion, but I am sure he will find on investigation that he has received some misinformation. In the first place, any officer of the Army can buy a uniform such as enlisted men wear and a pistol such as is furnished to them, a wrist watch such as is furnished to them, and other articles.

As to profiteering, I do not care to enter into that, because I do not know anything about it. My statement was that the House Members stated that this matter would be provided for by regulations, if the regulations did not already cover it. That was one of their arguments or excuses to our insistence upon the amendment. Of course, the Senator does not propose to hold up this bill.

Mr. JONES of Washington. No; I do not.

Mr. WARREN. But I think if the Senator wishes to introduce a resolution of inquiry or to take the subject up personally he ought to get at the exact facts about it. Certainly we ought to correct any abuses there may be, and that was the idea of the measure which the Senator introduced and which we sought to carry into effect, but such a measure can not be framed upon the kind of information the Senator is giving us now, because no one who has had these matters under consideration during former years can believe that the Senator has been correctly informed as to all the statements he has quoted.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I stated the source of my information.

Mr. WARREN. I understand that.

Mr. JONES of Washington. But that is only one article. Leave that out. I am going to refer, in view of the suggestions just made, to some of the facts which I have heretofore put in the RECORD and which came to me from officers who had actually bought these articles and who knew what they were furnished for in the officers' training camps. Here is one, a waist belt. The Government price is 17 cents, while the officer had to pay to the retailer 50 cents. There is a greater proportion of gain than there is in the case of the watch, although not quite so much money is involved.

A friend of mine who went into a training camp and through it told me that the belt which was furnished to him while he was in the training camp for 17 cents, when he got through the training camp and became an officer could not be obtained from the Government, but he had to pay the retailer 50 cents for that belt. He told me, further, that while he was in the training camp he was furnished a pair of shoes for $2.50 or $2.60—I forget the exact amount—but when he got through the training camp and became an officer he could not get the shoes from the Government and when he went into the retail stores he had to pay six or seven dollars for the very same shoes which the Government furnished to him while at the training camp for a price under $3. Those are just samples. I have the list here on page 1075 of the RECORD.

Mr. WARREN. Has that been verified by the department?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I did not refer this to the department. The figures were given to me by one who knew, and I do not think there is any question about them at all. I have obtained similar figures from other officers with reference to these matters.

Mr. WARREN. I do not doubt the figures the Senator has just given.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I do not think there is any doubt about them.

Mr. WARREN. But in regard to the watches, I think there may be some serious question.

Mr. JONES of Washington. That may be true, but I did not refer to the watches in my last statement. I have given the Senator the source of my information in reference to all these matters. Grant, however, that the statement in regard to the watches is not correct, although the Representative in Congress gave me his authority for the statement he made; he knew the man who told him about it, and he is satisfied that the statement is correct; it is just in line with the facts in regard to other articles. Why, Mr. President, every father who has had to furnish a uniform for his son who has gone into the Army knows the outrageous prices charged for these articles. Many have worried a great deal about getting these uniforms. The high cost has worked a great hardship. I hope that somebody in another place will take some interest in the matter. I have felt that I have done all that I could do and I have made myself a sort of nuisance in this body in reference to the matter. The Senate has certainly done its duty, for, as the chairman of the committee has stated, it has passed this proposition unanimously three times.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, let me suggest to the Senator that there is a subcommittee of the Military Affairs Committee on the Quartermaster Department, and I am going to request the chairman of that subcommittee to take this matter up and investigate it, so that we may have the authentic facts with reference to the whole situation.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I am very glad indeed to know that. In reply to the suggestion of the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER], I do not think he understood what was brought out a moment ago. The War Department, since this matter was brought up, has taken steps toward lessening the cost to the officers to some extent and is taking care of this situation to a certain extent. I put in the RECORD the other day a copy of an order from which it appears they now furnish the cloth for the uniforms at cost, and then they make contracts with different tailors and tailoring companies to make the uniforms for the officers, the officers to pay whatever the contract price may be; but that does not take care of the shoes; it does not take care of the boots; it does not take care of the leggings; it does not take care of the belts; it does not take care of all of the equipment that these officers must have, that the Government requires them to have, and it allows the collection of a great profit on the labor cost that must be paid by the officer. Further, I will simply add that the War Department, in responding to a question from the committee of the House with reference to this bill, said, in effect, that they could comply with it; and they ought to be required to do it. I hope others will take an interest in this matter so important to so many of our patriotic young men. They are doing enough for their country without being taxed millions for the benefit of those who stay at home. Congress is treating them unjustly so long as it permits this to continue.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I should like to address an inquiry to the chairman of the committee. I took considerable interest in the legislation contained in this bill as it passed the Senate, giving increased rank to the several Medical Corps of the Army. I realize how widespread the interest is among the physicians of the United States in getting this advanced rank to secure greater efficiency here and abroad, and I am impressed with the splendid work they are doing in connection with the Army. I should like to ask the chairman how far the House conferees have acceded to the Senate proposition?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, the Senator will remember that when the bill was in the Senate the last time a provision was inserted in it with reference to the Medical Corps which was a compromise measure and which had been agreed upon after many conferences. When we got into conference we found that some of the conferees of the House were very much opposed to any additions to the Medical Corps; but notwithstanding that, Mr. President, we finally reached an agreement that, I think, was satisfactory to all. If the Senator would like to have me read it, I will do so.

Mr. PENROSE. For the purpose of having it inserted in the RECORD, if for nothing else, in view of the widespread interest in this proposition, I should like to have the Secretary read the paragraph as the Senate passed it and then have the Secretary read the paragraph as the conferees reported it, if the Senator from Oregon will consent to that interruption.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the matter referred to by the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It is amendment No. 65.

Mr. PENROSE. I do not know whether the amendment of the Senate has been changed or not.

The SECRETARY. Amendment No. 65, as agreed to by the Senate, is as follows:

Increase in Medical Department: That the Medical Department of the Regular Army be, and is hereby, increased by one assistant surgeon general, who shall have the rank of major general, and three assistant surgeons general, who shall have the rank of brigadier general, all of whom shall be appointed from the Medical Corps of the Regular Army.

That the President may nominate and appoint in the Medical Department of the National Army, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, from the Medical Reserve Corps of the Regular Army not to exceed four major generals and eight brigadier generals for each 1,000,000 officers and enlisted men of the entire National Army.

That the commissioned officers of the Medical Corps of the Regular Army, none of whom shall have rank above that of colonel, shall be proportionately distributed in the several grades as now provided by law.

That the commissioned officers of the Medical Reserve Corps of the Regular Army, none of whom shall have rank above that of colonel, shall be proportionately distributed in the several grades as now provided by law for the Medical Corps of the Navy.

That the President may designate as "consultants" officers of either the Medical Corps or the Medical Reserve Corps and may relieve them as the interests of the service may require: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be held or construed so as to discharge any officer of the Regular Army or deprive him of a commission which he now holds therein.

And as agreed to by the conference——

Mr. PENROSE. Yes; I should like to have the Secretary now read the conference proposition in lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate.

The Secretary read as follows:

Increase in Medical Department: That the Medical Department of the Regular Army be, and is hereby, increased by one assistant surgeon general, for service abroad during the present war, who shall have the rank of major general, and two assistant surgeon generals, who shall have the rank of brigadier general, all of whom shall be appointed from the Medical Corps of the Regular Army.

That the President may nominate and appoint in the Medical Department of the National Army, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, from the Medical Reserve Corps of the Regular Army not to exceed two major generals and four brigadier generals.

That the commissioned officers of the Medical Corps of the Regular Army, none of whom shall have rank above that of colonel, shall be proportionately distributed in the several grades as now provided by law.

That the commissioned officers of the Medical Reserve Corps of the Regular Army, none of whom shall have rank above that of colonel, shall be proportionately distributed in the several grades as now provided by law for the Medical Corps of the Regular Army: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be held or construed so as to discharge any officer of the Regular Army or deprive him of a commission which he now holds therein.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I can state to the Senator in a moment just what the changes are. It will be noted that the Senate amendment provided for the creation of three assistant surgeon generals with the rank of brigadier. We reduced that to two. The Senate originally provided for one assistant surgeon general with the rank of major general. We left that in, but we inserted "for service abroad," so that we only made that change with reference to that officer. Then, with reference to the major generals appointed in the Medical Department of the National Army, we reduced the number of major generals from four to two and the number of brigadier generals from eight to four.

Mr. PENROSE. Then, as far as the promotions from the Medical Reserve Corps in the National Army are concerned, the House has reduced the Senate proposition about 50 per cent?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. On the higher officers; but they have increased the colonels.

Mr. PENROSE. They increased the colonels?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes; and placed the National Army on exactly the same footing as the Regular Army with reference to colonels.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I want to ask the chairman of the committee about another matter which a hurried examination of the conference report leads me to think the conferees accepted just as the Senate passed it. I refer to the interdepartmental social-hygiene board.

Mr. PENROSE. That is in here.

Mr. JONES of Washington. That was agreed to as it passed the Senate, was it not?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. As it passed the Senate. It was agreed upon, I think, without any amendment at all.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I thought so, but I wanted to be sure.

Mr. PENROSE. I have not quite finished my inquiry.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Pardon me; I thought the Senator was through.

Mr. PENROSE. That is all right. I have had a considerable number of conferences with Pennsylvania physicians and with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN], the ranking minority member of the committee, and I should like to ask him whether he has anything to suggest in addition to what has been stated by the chairman of the committee.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, the chairman has set forth the real differences. I think it ought to be fairly satisfactory as it stands. Perhaps I might give some of the figures.

Mr. PENROSE. Yes; I should like very much to have them.

Mr. WARREN. For each million men in the National Army the Medical Reserve Corps will be entitled to have 220 colonels, 380 lieutenant colonels, 1,650 majors, and 4,750 captains and lieutenants. There will be that many for each million men of the National Army, and then there will be the generals that have been indicated—two major generals and four brigadier generals. They may have the same number of major generals as the Regular Army, and twice as many brigadiers as the Regular Army, and they may have fully as many and, in fact, the same proportion of colonels and lieutenant colonels as they have in the Regular Army, and they may have in the total number seven physicians for every thousand men. I may say, in passing, the House conferees stood against the Senate provisions as to the Medical Department, and wished it all cut out. It was one of the last three items finally reconciled, and the Senate conferees obtained all that was possible.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, in this connection I wish to say that when this bill was before the Senate it agreed to an amendment promoting Gen. Crowder to the rank of lieutenant general after quite a little discussion. I believe the vote was practically unanimous. When the matter got into conference Gen. Crowder, with that splendid spirit which he has always shown, stated that in view of the fact that there were so many who had been working with him and that would not be recognized for the valuable services they rendered, he did not want to be considered. In order that the spirit which he has shown and the reason which induced the conference committee to leave out his name may be made a matter of record, I desire to have his letter read to the Senate and inserted in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection the Secretary will read the letter.

The Secretary read as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE PROVOST MARSHAL GENERAL,
Washington, July 5, 1918.

Hon. GEORGE E. CHAMBERLAIN,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR CHAMBERLAIN: In view of that provision of the Army appropriation bill personal to myself, now pending before the conference committee, it is unavoidable that I should take this opportunity to lay before you and also Mr. DENT, chairman of the House conferees, my personal sentiments, and to ask you to communicate them, if you see fit, to your associates.

That the provision in question involves a compliment and a distinction which I value beyond anything in my military career is natural; and that the approval testified to by the vote of the Senate gratifies me beyond the power of words to express is a simple statement of fact.

But, after considerable reflection, and viewing the matter in a broad way, I am reluctant to allow the consideration of the proposed proviso to proceed any further. If the conferees are in accord with my wishes in this regard, I should be glad if you, for the Senate conferees, and Chairman DENT, for the House conferees, in reporting back to your respective Houses that the Senate conferees yielded on this provision, would say that the action was in accord with my request and for the express reason next to be stated.

Forty-eight States and three Territorial headquarters and nearly 6,000 local and district boards, with an aggregate membership of nearly 18,000 citizens, assisted by legal and medical advisory boards in every jurisdiction, have cooperated with the national headquarters efficiently and honorably, and many without compensation, in the superb teamwork which has produced the gratifying results attained under the selective-service law. These results embrace the registration of more than 10,500,000 of citizens and their classification for military service, and the entrainment of the nearly 1,600,000 men now serving with the colors. By August 1 of this year this latter number will be approximately 2,000,000, and by the close of the year, if expected requisitions are received, the aggregate will approach 3,000,000. Of the members of these boards it may be truly said that when the selective-service system which they administer ceases to function efficiently to produce the military and to conserve the industrial man power, we shall be in a fair way to lose this war. I have long entertained the view that something ought to be done to recognize publicly and emphatically the enormous sacrifices these citizens have made in bestowing the continuous and exhausting service that has been indispensable in carrying the administrative burden of the selective-service system. The difficulty has been in devising a suitable reward, nation-wide in its application, and acceptable generally to those who have so participated. At the risk of being regarded as ungrateful to the proposers of this provision, I can not bring myself to be satisfied that my own conscientiously performed share in discharging that duty should become the subject of recognition, so long as the far greater share of these other builders of the National Army remains without public and distinguished acknowledgment in the records of Congress.

These men, my fellow workers, their toils, their sacrifices, and their achievements, are next to my heart. On this subject, I frankly confess to a deep sentiment—I hope that it will not be reckoned as sentimentality—a sentiment which would not receive unalloyed satisfaction from the bestowal of any honor, however generous, that is personal to myself only.

In placing before you at this time these sincere convictions, I trust that I have adequately expressed the motive that prompted this letter.

Cordially and gratefully, yours,

E. H. CROWDER,
Provost Marshal General.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas.

Mr. THOMPSON. I desire to submit three conference reports, and——

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. BANKHEAD. This is a very important report that is about to be presented, and I think it is important that a majority of the Senate should be present, and I therefore suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. President, I raise a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas will state it.

Mr. THOMPSON. I have the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state his point of order.

Mr. THOMPSON. It is not in order to call for a quorum when another Senator has the floor.

Mr. BANKHEAD. It is always in order to call for a quorum.

Mr. THOMPSON. There are numerous decisions on that point, and I should like to call the Chair's attention to them if there is any doubt at all as to the ruling. I have the floor, and yielded only for a question. All I ask is the adoption of the conference reports, which are very important, in order that they may be communicated to the House.

Mr. BANKHEAD. That is the reason why I am calling for a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama insist upon his suggestion of the absence of a quorum?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I do.

Mr. THOMPSON. I raise the point of order that it is out of order to call for a quorum when another Senator has the floor. I desire to call attention to the various precedents of the Senate. There are numerous ones, and the Senate has never decided otherwise.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will listen to them for a moment.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will please state it.

Mr. BORAH. Is it in order now to make a motion to adjourn?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is.

Mr. BORAH. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. THOMPSON. I hope the Senator will withhold that——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is not debatable.

Mr. BORAH. I desire to have a vote on that motion.

Mr. PHELAN. I ask for a roll call.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from California calls for the yeas and nays. Is the request seconded? [A pause.]

Mr. PHELAN. My object is——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is not debatable. The request is seconded, and the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. What are we voting on?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On a motion to adjourn.

The Secretary resumed the calling of the roll.

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before as to my pair and its transfer, I vote "nay."

Mr. MYERS (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN] to the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] and vote "nay."

Mr. STERLING (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] to the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] and vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. GERRY (after having voted in the negative). I have a general pair with the Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS] and let my vote stand.

Mr. PENROSE (after having voted in the negative). I observe that the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] is absent and has not voted. Having a general pair with him, I will transfer the same to the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BAIRD] and let my vote stand.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I should have announced, as I did before, the transfer of my general pair with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT] to the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN]. I will let this announcement stand during the votes to-day.

Mr. KENDRICK (after having voted in the negative). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL]. I transfer that pair to the junior senator from Nevada [Mr. HENDERSON] and let my vote stand.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (after having voted in the negative). I did not announce the transfer of my pair. I announce the transfer the same as before and let my vote stand.

Mr. CURTIS. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] and withhold my vote.

The result was announced—yeas 10, nays 41, as follows:

YEAS—10.

Borah	Johnson, Cal.	Norris	Warren

PENSIONS AND INCREASE OF PENSIONS.

Mr. THOMPSON submitted the following conference report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 3798) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy and of wars other than the Civil War, and to certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its amendments numbered 2, 4.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the House numbered 1, 3, 6, 7, and agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 5, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: Restore the matter stricken out by said amendment, amended to read as follows:

"The name of Esther Shields, former widow of Walter Rogers, late of General Mounted Service, United States Army, Regular Establishment, and pay her a pension at the rate of $12 per month."

And the House agree to the same.

HENRY F. HOLLIS,
WM. H. THOMPSON,
REED SMOOT,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
JOHN A. KEY,
EDWARD KEATING,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I wish to ask the Senator from Kansas if these are the bills that we passed a few days ago?

Mr. THOMPSON. These are the bills passed a short time ago.

Mr. JONES of Washington. One of the bills proposed to give a pension for the widows of Gen. Miles and Rear Admiral Cottman. Does the Senator remember whether that bill is covered in any of the conference reports he is now presenting?

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator there is a bill with Senate amendments which have not been agreed to by the House, and that is the bill the Senator refers to. The Senator from Kansas will no doubt move that the Senate insist on its amendments and ask for a conference.

Mr. JONES of Washington. That bill has not gone to conference.

Mr. SMOOT. It has not gone to conference.

Mr. CURTIS. Is a further conference asked?

Mr. THOMPSON. No; it is a complete report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is so much confusion the Chair can not hear, and he is sure that other Senators can not hear.

Mr. CURTIS. I understood the Senator from Utah to state that there had been no agreement. May I be told what bill this is?

Mr. THOMPSON. This is a conference report on Senate bill 3798, and it is an agreement.

Mr. CURTIS. I should like to know what the bill is.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I ask that the first name in the bill be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state it.

The Secretary read as follows:

The name of Abel H. Hall, Senate bill 3798.

Mr. JONES of Washington. That is not the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. THOMPSON submitted the following conference report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 4542) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy and of wars other than the Civil War, and to certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its amendments numbered 3, 4, 9, and 10.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the House numbered 1, 2, 6, 7, and 8, and agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 5, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the amount proposed insert "$17"; and the House agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 11, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the amount proposed insert "$17"; and the House agree to the same.

HENRY F. HOLLIS,
WM. H. THOMPSON,
REED SMOOT,

JOHN A. KEY,
EDWARD KEATING,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I should like to have the first name stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the first name.

The SECRETARY. "William T. Black."

The report was agreed to.

Mr. THOMPSON submitted the following conference report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 4193) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy and of wars other than the Civil War, and to certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its amendments numbered 1 and 5.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the House numbered 3, 4, 6, 7, 8, and 9 and agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 2, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Restore the matter stricken out by said amendment, amended to read as follows:

"The name of Thomas S. Gher, late of Company C, Fourth Regiment Illinois Volunteer Infantry, War with Spain, and pay him a pension at the rate of $12 per month."

And the House agree to the same.

HENRY F. HOLLIS,
WM. H. THOMPSON,
REED SMOOT,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
JOHN A. KEY,
EDWARD KEATING,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I should like to have the first name in that bill stated.

The SECRETARY. John B. Chandler.

The report was agreed to.

FUNERAL EXPENSES.

Mr. THOMPSON. From the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate I report back favorably Senate resolution 278, and ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to receiving the report at this time?

Mr. POMERENE. I object to that.

Mr. THOMPSON. I think the Senator will not object to this resolution.

Mr. POMERENE. There is another matter that is quite as important as the payment of these bills.

Mr. THOMPSON. Will the Senator permit me to state what it is? It is to pay the expenses incurred at the funeral——

Mr. POMERENE. That can be done at any minute after this matter is disposed of.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will go to the calendar.

PREVENTION OF CORRUPT PRACTICES.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3438) to prevent corrupt practices in the election of Senators, Representatives, or Delegates in Congress.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. The pending amendment is the amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] to transpose the words "at any primary or general or special election" to come in after the word "Congress," in line 11, so that it will read:

or withhold their vote or to vote for or against any particular candidate for Senator or Representative or Delegate in Congress at any primary or general or special election.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Let there be order in the Chamber.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, we are legislating here upon matters, which matters we do not hear or undertake to consider. We will either have order here and consider them in an orderly way or I shall take the floor and occupy it until order is restored. I do not propose myself to see this legislation pass through in this form. We are holding caucuses, double caucuses, and joint caucuses here in the aisle and considering the question of a recess while there is legislation of vital importance being pushed through in confusion. One of two things must happen. We will either legislate in order or we will not legislate at all.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. OVERMAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 10 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

RECESS.

Mr. MARTIN. I move that the Senate take a recess until 8 o'clock this evening.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until 8 o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The Senate reassembled at 8 o'clock p. m.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Borah	Johnson, Cal.	Overman	Simmons
Curtis	Jones, Wash.	Pittman	Smith, Md.
Fletcher	Lenroot	Pomerene	Smoot
France	Lewis	Ransdell	Swanson
Gerry	Martin	Saulsbury	Thompson
Gore	Myers	Shafroth	Trammell
Hale	Nugent	Sheppard

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Twenty-seven Senators have answered to their names. The Secretary will call the roll of absentees.

The Secretary called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. MCKELLAR, Mr. SMITH of Arizona, Mr. STERLING, and Mr. VARDAMAN answered to their names when called.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I desire to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. THOMAS] on official business.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia and Mr. BANKHEAD entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Thirty-three Senators have answered to their names. There is not a quorum present.

Mr. MARTIN. I move that the Sergeant at Arms be instructed to notify absent Senators to attend the session of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Sergeant at Arms is so instructed.

Mr. SHIELDS, Mr. PHELAN, Mr. PENROSE, Mr. ASHURST, Mr. REED, Mr. KENDRICK, Mr. JONES of New Mexico, and Mr. KING entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

After a little delay,

Mr. KELLOGG, Mr. CUMMINS, Mr. BECKHAM, Mr. NEW, Mr. POINDEXTER, Mr. GUION, and Mr. SUTHERLAND entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Forty-eight Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

CORRUPT PRACTICES.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3438) to prevent corrupt practices in the election of Senators, Representatives, or Delegates in Congress.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] to the bill.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment which has been proposed by the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] will now be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 9, after the word "candidate," it is proposed to insert "or whoever solicits, accepts, or receives any money or other thing of value in consideration of his vote for or against any candidate."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I ask that the amendment be again stated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will again state the amendment.

The Secretary again stated the amendment proposed by Mr. FLETCHER.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I simply desire to get an intelligent idea of where this amendment is proposed to come in. I did not understand.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is to be inserted after the word "candidate," in line 9, the Chair is informed.

Mr. FLETCHER. The purpose of the amendment is to make the person receiving the bribe equally guilty with the man who gives the bribe.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. REED. I should like to have the bill as amended read in order that we may get it altogether.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the bill as amended.

The Secretary read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That whoever shall promise, offer, or give, or cause to be promised, offered, or given, any money or other things of value, or shall make or tender any contract, undertaking, obligation, gratuity, or security for the payment of money or for the delivery or conveyance of anything of value to any person or persons, either to vote or withhold their vote or to vote for or against any candidate, or whoever solicits, accepts, or receives any money or other thing of value in consideration of his vote for or against any candidate for Senator or Representative or Delegate in Congress at any primary or general or special election, shall be fined not more than $1,000, or imprisoned not more than one year, or both.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I do not think the Secretary read the amendment as it has been amended, if I followed him correctly, and I will ask that the Secretary, beginning on line 7, after the word "value," read the bill as it has been amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

Anything of value to any person or persons, either to vote or withhold their vote or to vote for or against any candidate, or whoever solicits, accepts, or receives any money or other thing of value in consideration of his vote for or against any candidate for Senator or Representative or Delegate in Congress at any primary or general or special election, shall be fined not more than $1,000, or imprisoned not more than one year, or both.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, where the words "at any primary or general or special election" transposed by vote of the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that those words were transposed on motion of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN].

Mr. SMOOT. Very well.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading and read the third time.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I think it is very important to take up Calendar No. 487, being House bill 12100, and dispose of it, and I make that motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill under consideration has not yet been passed.

Mr. FLETCHER. I thought it had been disposed of.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Florida is referring to another matter?

Mr. FLETCHER. Yes; I thought the bill under consideration had been concluded.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill having been read the third time, the question is, Shall it pass?

The bill was passed.

STIMULATION OF AGRICULTURE.

Mr. SHEPPARD and Mr. FLETCHER addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Texas.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I hope that the Senate will proceed to the consideration——

Mr. FLETCHER. I move that the Senate——

Mr. SHEPPARD. Who has been recognized, Mr. President?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Texas has been recognized.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 11945.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I will say that the bill to which I have referred has been reported ever since the 27th of June, and I have been endeavoring to get action on it.

Mr. PENROSE. We can not hear on this side of the Chamber.

Mr. FLETCHER. It is a House bill, and it would not take long to pass it.

Mr. PENROSE. What is it about?

Mr. FLETCHER. It is a bill amending the act establishing the Shipping Board so as to give them additional powers in connection with the requisition and operation of ships.

Mr. PENROSE. If it is anything like the shipping bill the Senator has already presented, it will take considerable time to discuss it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question before the Senate is on the motion of the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD] that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 11945.

Mr. REED. What is that bill?

Mr. SMOOT. What is the calendar number?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the title of the bill.

The SECRETARY. Calendar No. 476, bill (H. R. 11945) to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to carry out, during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, the purposes of the act entitled "An act to provide further for the national security and defense by stimulating agriculture and facilitating the distribution of agricultural products."

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I rise to an inquiry. The Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] had the floor, as I understand, and had addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state to the Senator from Missouri that the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD] was recognized immediately after the previous bill had passed. The Chair did not understand what the Senator from Florida wanted.

Mr. FLETCHER. Before that I was recognized and made the motion. Then the President pro tempore said the bill had not yet passed, and I yielded until that bill was passed. Then I understood that I had the floor and was prepared to renew the motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Florida is mistaken about that. The Chair recognized the Senator from Texas immediately on the passage of the bill and did not know the Senator desired recognition then. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Texas.

Mr. BORAH. Upon that motion I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to have the bill read, Mr. President, so that we may know what it is.

Mr. PENROSE. I should like to have the bill read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the bill.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the Senator who asked for the reading of the bill is not listening——

Mr. PENROSE. I am listening very carefully, Mr. President; and I am looking carefully to see that the bill is read, I will tell the Senator.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will proceed.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the bill.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I rise to a question of order. The Secretary is reading a very important bill, and it is impossible for any Senator to hear him. I insist that order be maintained in the Senate, so that we may hear the reading of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will try to preserve order in the Senate, and requests Senators to assist by avoiding disorder on the floor. The Secretary will proceed.

The Secretary resumed and continued the reading of the bill to the end of the third paragraph, on page 5, line 23.

ADJOURNMENT TO AUGUST 12, 1918.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, I send to the desk a privileged motion, being a concurrent resolution to adjourn to a day certain, which I ask may be considered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the concurrent resolution.

The Secretary read the concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 20), as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That when the two Houses of Congress adjourn on Saturday, the calendar day of July 6, they adjourn to meet at 12 o'clock meridian on August 12, 1918, unless sooner convened by the President of the United States.

Mr. BORAH. Do I understand the Senator has asked consent to be heard on this resolution at this time?

Mr. MARTIN. I have not. It is a privileged resolution and it is not debatable. I submit the resolution to the Senate.

Mr. BORAH. Does the Senator contend that this motion to adjourn is not debatable?

Mr. MARTIN. I do.

Mr. BORAH. To a day certain?

Mr. MARTIN. I do.

Mr. BORAH. Well, I presume the Senator wants to have it heard at this time.

Mr. MARTIN. I want a vote on it.

Mr. BORAH. Well, I will find out what the Chair has to say about it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will be glad to have the Senator from Virginia refer him to the rule, if he can turn to it quickly.

Mr. MARTIN. I thought the Chair had it before him.

Mr. FLETCHER. It is Rule XXII.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, if the Senator will turn to Gilfry's Precedents, on page 26, he will find that a resolution for final adjournment is privileged.

Mr. BORAH. Well, let the Senator from Virginia read it.

Mr. SWANSON. Very well. It is as follows:

The Vice President (Mr. Hobart) laid before the Senate for its consideration the resolution from the House of Representatives——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. From what page is the Senator reading?

Mr. SWANSON. I am reading from Gilfry's Precedents, page 26:

The Vice President (Mr. Hobart) laid before the Senate for its consideration the resolution of the House of Representatives providing for the final adjournment of the two Houses of Congress at 9 o'clock p. m. this day, when Mr. Morgan objected to the consideration of the resolution and raised a point of order, viz, that objection having been made, the resolution, under clause 5, Rule XIV, must lie over one day for consideration.

The Vice President overruled the question of order and decided that the resolution, which provided for an adjournment of Congress, was a question of privilege, and that the provision of Rule XIV was not applicable thereto.

From the decision of the Chair Mr. Allen appealed to the Senate; when, on motion by Mr. Aldrich that the appeal lie on the table, it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 36, nays 20. So the appeal was laid on the table.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I call attention to the fact that that was a motion for final adjournment.

Mr. SWANSON. That does not make any difference.

Mr. BORAH. It does make a difference. Mr. Frye, while he was President pro tempore of the Senate, held that while a motion to adjourn sine die was not debatable, a motion to adjourn to a time certain was.

Mr. SWANSON. I do not remember that decision.

Mr. BORAH. I remember it distinctly, because I took part in the debate.

Mr. SWANSON. It says:

The Vice President overruled the question of order and decided that the resolution which provided for an adjournment of Congress was a question of privilege and that the provision of Rule XIV was not applicable thereto.

If that is applicable at all, it applies to all resolutions for adjournment coming under the rule which has been cited. The rule provides that a motion to adjourn is not debatable and is privileged. The question has arisen as to whether a motion to adjourn sine die was included under the rule, and upon that question it was decided that it included all motions to adjourn sine die for a day and otherwise. There might be a precedent for a day certain, but I can not recall it; but the contention for a long time in the Senate was that the motion to adjourn simply applied to adjournment from one day to another. After much debate on the question of sine die adjournment and the question of adjournment from day to day, as I understand, it has been finally decided that the rule which did not make it debatable and made it privileged applied to all motions to adjourn. Now, that was reaffirmed here. This was a motion to adjourn sine die. I have not looked up the precedents with regard to adjournment from day to day. I have not had time. That decision was reaffirmed by President pro tempore Clarke of Arkansas, on page 11, volume 2, of the precedents.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. SWANSON. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. At the time these motions were made, was there a motion pending before the Senate?

Mr. SWANSON. There was a motion made by the Senator from South Carolina to proceed to the consideration of a bill when the President pro tempore of the Senate, Mr. Clarke, ruled. I will read what he said in reference to it.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator for a minute?

Mr. SWANSON. Yes.

Mr. FLETCHER. Turning to Rule XXII, on page 20 of the Manual, it is stated:

When a question is pending no motion shall be received but—
To adjourn.
To adjourn to a day certain, or that when the Senate adjourn it shall be to a day certain.

And so forth. Then, on the next page, page 21, it says:

Which several motions shall have precedence as they stand arranged; and the motions relating to adjournment—

Not a motion to adjourn, but—the motions relating to adjournment, to take a recess, to proceed to the consideration of executive business, to lay on the table, shall be decided without debate.

Mr. NORRIS. This is not a motion to adjourn or a motion to take a recess. This is a concurrent resolution.

Mr. FLETCHER. Relating to adjournment.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, as I told the Senator, the question has been before the Senate for a long time as to whether that rule included all motions to adjourn, and it was decided that the rule included a motion to adjourn sine die. As I understand, it includes in it all motions to adjourn.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. Is this a joint resolution?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is a concurrent resolution.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I ask the Senator, and I challenge the Senator to present to the Senate a precedent where it has been held that a concurrent resolution to adjourn to a time certain is not debatable. The only question involved here is not whether this motion takes precedence and is privileged but the question whether or not it is debatable.

Mr. SWANSON. If the Senator will permit me, a motion to adjourn sine die is a concurrent resolution, because one body can not adjourn without the consent of the other, and these precedents are based entirely on concurrent resolutions. I never knew anybody to introduce a resolution to adjourn sine die that was not a concurrent resolution.

Mr. BORAH. But the Senator has not cited any precedent which says that a proposition to adjourn to a time certain is not debatable.

Mr. SWANSON. The rule says that.

Mr. BORAH. Who says it?

Mr. SWANSON. The rule of the Senate.

Mr. BORAH. The rule does not refer to that class of motions.

Mr. FLETCHER. Undoubtedly it does; it says "relating to adjournment."

Mr. SWANSON. The rule has been interpreted as applying to all motions to adjourn.

Mr. FLETCHER. Motions relating to adjournment.

Mr. SWANSON (reading)—

Which several motions shall have precedence as they stand arranged; and the motions relating to adjournment, to take a recess, to proceed to the consideration of executive business, to lay on the table, shall be decided without debate.

Mr. BORAH. Precisely. That is a motion for the Senate to adjourn.

Mr. SWANSON. But, if the Senator will permit me, it does not limit it to the Senate. All of the motions upon which these decisions were rendered were based upon concurrent resolutions of the two Houses to adjourn sine die. The Senator does not think that any resolution would be introduced that did not require joint action of the two Houses, does he?

Mr. BORAH. The Senator is not contending, is he, that Rule XXII has any reference except to motions upon the part of the Senate?

Mr. SWANSON. I do. I contend that it has been held repeatedly that that rule applies to a motion to adjourn sine die.

Mr. BORAH. The rule that the Senator is reading is a Senate rule, and relates to the adjournment of the Senate.

Mr. SWANSON. We are proceeding under the Senate rules.

Mr. BORAH. But you are seeking to adjourn the Congress.

Mr. SWANSON. The Senate takes its action under this rule, and then the House takes its action. All motions before the Senate, as to bills or anything else, require joint action of the House and Senate. Does the Senator contend that because joint action is required in the consideration of a bill the rule is different? It says "relating to adjournment."

Mr. BORAH. I can only say that some eight years ago this question was brought up upon a concurrent resolution to adjourn, when Senator Frye was in the chair. The question was raised by Senator Hale of Maine, his colleague, that it was not debatable, and Senator Frye held that it was debatable, and it was debated here during one entire evening.

Mr. SWANSON. I should like to read another decision on this point.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will be gratified if the Senator from Idaho will find the ruling to which he has referred.

Mr. BORAH. I do not know now where it appears in the RECORD, but the reason why I remember it so well is because I was interested myself in a resolution, and I did not want the adjournment, and I took part in the debate. I can not turn to the RECORD at once.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, on page 11 of the Precedents, Decisions on Points or Order, by Gilfry, volume 2, number 6, the heading is:

May not supplant a concurrent resolution for final adjournment at end of session by a motion to proceed to the consideration of a bill, and question of, is not debatable.

That is the heading.

The President pro tempore (Mr. Clarke of Arkansas) laid before the Senate the concurrent resolution of the House for a final adjournment of the session; when,

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 6060, Calendar No. 297, known as the immigration bill.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, I raise the point of order that the adjournment resolution can not be supplanted by a motion of that sort. The motion of the Senator from South Carolina is not in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore (Mr. Clarke of Arkansas). The point of order is not debatable, except reasonably for the purpose of advising the Chair. Whatever views the Chair might have held about the point of order raised by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN], independent of investigation for himself, he must be governed by the precedents of the Senate as the same have been established by the deliberate action of the Senate. In the Fifty-fifth Congress, first session, on the 24th of July, 1897, this situation was presented—

And that is the decision that he reaffirmed, that I have read to the Chair, by Mr. Hobart, who was then Vice President—

Debate can proceed by unanimous consent if no Senator objects.

That ruling reaffirmed the decision of Vice President Hobart on a motion to adjourn sine die by concurrent resolution.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I listened with a good deal of interest to the reading of the concurrent resolution, especially with reference to its language. Of course we all recall the constitutional provision which this concurrent resolution is supposed to meet; and while to my mind it is questionable whether or not the language of the concurrent resolution as introduced meets the requirements of the Constitution, if the language does meet the provision of the Constitution then the resolution must be something more than a mere motion to adjourn, or a motion to adjourn to a day certain, because the constitutional provision is:

> Neither House, during the session of Congress, shall, without the consent of the other, adjourn for more than three days, nor to any other place than that in which the two Houses shall be sitting.

So that this concurrent resolution, whatever its language may be, must involve something more than a mere adjournment or an adjournment to a day certain. It must involve the granting of consent to the other House of Congress to adjourn for more than three days under the Constitution; and this, it seems to me, does not come under the rule which has been referred to by the Senator from Virginia, because it must have for its purpose the consenting by the Senate to an adjournment of the House for a period greater than three days. In the language in which the resolution is drawn, it may well be questioned whether that does not end this session of Congress. It is an adjournment for a definite period of time. It is an adjournment of the Congress. It is not in the language of the Constitution, so as to grant consent to the other House that it may adjourn for a longer period than three days, but it is a concurrent resolution for an adjournment.

Mr. SWANSON. If the Senator will permit me, these decisions were rendered on concurrent resolutions.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. But they were concurrent resolutions for an adjournment of the session of the Congress, not for an extended recess, if I have been able to follow the language which the Senator has read.

Mr. SWANSON. The reason of that is because they have always thought that the greater included the less. An adjournment for 30 days is less than an adjournment sine die, and it has never been contended that the less is not included in the greater. The contention has been on the question of adjournment sine die, saying that it was not included; but the words "adjournment to a day certain" are specifically included in the rule itself, which says that such motion must be determined without debate.

Mr. BORAH. May I ask the Senator from Virginia whether this is a proposal for an adjournment of Congress or for a recess?

Mr. SWANSON. It is a proposal for an adjournment, precisely like we take for the Christmas holidays every year.

Mr. BORAH. I do not care anything about the Christmas holidays. Is this an adjournment, or is it a recess?

Mr. SWANSON. It is an adjournment to a day certain, precisely like we take an adjournment for two weeks during the Christmas holidays, such as the House and the Senate have taken repeatedly every year. The language is that in which the resolution is usually drawn. It is the same language that has been used, I suppose, in the case of all these adjournments, wherever they exceed three days.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, may I ask to have the concurrent resolution read again?

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit an interruption on that point, the resolution is exactly like the motions we make every day, to adjourn until the next day at 12 o'clock.

Mr. BORAH. Oh, no; it is not.

Mr. SWANSON. It is in the same language.

Mr. BORAH. I thought there was something else.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Idaho has asked that the resolution be stated. The Chair will say to the Senate that he is ready to rule on this question.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I should like to call attention particularly to this language of the Constitution, which says that neither House shall adjourn for more than three days without the consent of the other; so it should not be a concurrent resolution for the adjournment of Congress, but it should be a privilege granted to either House to adjourn for a specific length of time. The concurrent resolution, of course, accomplishes that, but not in language which seems to me to meet the specific requirements of the Constitution. I submit that the proper varbiage of the concurrent resolution should be that either House may adjourn until August 12 with the consent of the other.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. I ask to have the resolution read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the concurrent resolution.

The Secretary again read the concurrent resolution.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, that is not an ordinary resolution to adjourn. It is no kith or kin to the resolution upon which these precedents were established. Here is a separate and distinct matter incorporated in this concurrent resolution, and there is no precedent for shutting off debate upon this kind of a resolution. But, Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays, because I want the responsibility fixed.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I suggest that the matter has not been submitted to the Senate. It is for the President pro tempore to decide, and I should like to have the President pro tempore decide it.

Mr. PENROSE. Before the decision is made, as I view it, every day when we adjourn a motion is made to adjourn until 12 o'clock the next day, unless we want to eliminate the morning hour and preserve the legislative day, when we take a recess. That is the only difference. If we wanted to preserve the legislative day for the next month, we could take a recess in this case; but we adjourn, as we have been trying to do, all winter and all summer. The reference to the President calling us together is, in my opinion, clearly surplusage. It means nothing. Of course, the President has the right under the Constitution, and has been doing it for over 140 years, to call the two Houses together after an adjournment, if he thinks the public business requires it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair does not think a ruling from the Chair is necessary, although he is ready to give it, if there is no more debate. The point of order was made on the question of whether the motion was debatable. The yeas and nays are now called for.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I should like to have the question decided. I make the point of order that the motion is debatable, and also that it is not in order when another motion was pending, and I should like to have the Chair rule on that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair may as well rule, then, to dispose of the matter.

The Chair holds this to be a motion to adjourn to a day certain, and therefore covered by Rule XXII. The Chair thinks that this or some equivalent method of obtaining the consent of the House of Representatives is the only way in which the Senate could adjourn for more than three days, because of the constitutional provision referred to by the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES]; but the Chair, moreover, thinks that this is a perfectly proper way to obtain the consent of the House, by a concurrent resolution, which will affect both Houses.

The Chair is therefore compelled to hold that the motion is not debatable, as it comes under the provisions of Rule XXII.

Mr. BORAH. I ask for the yeas and nays upon the concurrent resolution.

Mr. BANKHEAD and Mr. GORE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Texas was recognized and he has moved to take up House bill 11945.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I demand a recapitulation of the vote which was just taken.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Too late.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks the Senator should have that privilege in case the Chair has made a mistake.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I do not think the Chair has made a mistake, but the vote was so close I think there should be another recapitulation.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I ask if the Senator from Alabama has a right to make that request.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator has that right. The Secretary will recapitulate the vote.

The Secretary again recapitulated the vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On a recapitulation the Secretary reports to the Chair the vote as announced on the prior occasion—27 yeas and 26 nays. The resolution is therefore agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by G. F. Turner, one of its clerks, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 3009) granting the consent of Congress to the P. M. C. Coal Co. to construct and maintain a bridge across Tug River, connecting Pike County, Ky., and Mingo County, W. Va.

The message further announced that the House agrees to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 11048) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the establishment of a Bureau of War-Risk Insurance in the Treasury Department," approved September 2, 1914, as amended by the act approved June 12, 1917.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills, and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

H. R. 11048. An act to amend the war-risk insurance act.

STIMULATION OF AGRICULTURE.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I renew my motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Texas moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 11945) to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to carry out, during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, the purposes of the act entitled "An act to provide further for the national security and defense by stimulating agriculture and facilitating the distribution of agricultural products." [Putting the question.] The noes seem to have it.

Mr. BORAH. Upon that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll, and Mr. ASHURST responded in the affirmative.

Mr. PENROSE. I rise to a point of order. I think the motion is debatable and no opportunity has been given for debate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The roll call has begun.

Mr. PENROSE. No Senator was given an opportunity to be recognized.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The roll call will be proceeded with.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I desire to have it the unfinished business——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No debate is in order.

The Secretary resumed the calling of the roll.

Mr. CURTIS (when his name was called). Making the same announcement that I made on the previous vote, I vote "yea."

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). Announcing my pair as before, I vote "nay."

So the motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 11945) to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to carry out, during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, the purposes of the act entitled "An act to provide further for the national security and defense by stimulating agriculture and facilitating the distribution of agricultural products."

DATA ON PROFITEERING (S. DOC. NO. 248).

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I wish to have an order entered for printing 15,000 copies of the report of the Federal Trade Commission with reference to profiteering. The print has been exhausted, and I ask to have an order entered to print 15,000 copies.

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator know what 15,000 copies would cost?

Mr. BORAH. No; I do not.

Mr. SMOOT. If it costs more than $200 to print them, I will say to the Senator under the law it can not be done by an order of the Senate.

Mr. BORAH. I could not state how much it would cost, but in order to be sure that I am within the law I will ask that 5,000 copies be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. FLETCHER. The law requires that any estimate of the cost shall be submitted with a motion of that kind. That is the general rule; but I have no objection to the order being entered. I think it is a very important document.

Mr. BORAH. I think that is a requirement that is very often disregarded.

Mr. FLETCHER. Why not make the motion to print up to the limit of $200?

Mr. BORAH. I think 5,000 additional copies will be sufficient.

Mr. FLETCHER. Very well.

Mr. NORRIS. Let me ask the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], who is a member of the committee, a question as to the cost of this printing. I have a copy of the document in my hand, and it contains 20 pages.

Mr. SMOOT. Then, I will say to the Senator from Nebraska, if the document contains 20 pages, to print 5,000 copies of it will come within the limit.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to have the document printed up to the limit, because there is a great demand for it.

Mr. SMOOT. I will not say just how many copies could be printed for that sum.

Mr. NORRIS. I have not been able to get a single copy of this document, except the one which I hold in my hand.

Mr. MCKELLAR. I will ask the Senator from Idaho if he will not leave his request at the original number of 15,000 copies? I think this is a very important document; indeed, it is one of the most important documents we have.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I desire to ask whether or not the consideration of this matter will displace the unfinished business, or has the unfinished business been temporarily laid aside?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] was proceeding practically by unanimous consent. The Chair thinks the consideration of the matter asked for by him would displace the business which was just taken up, if a motion were made and agreed to, to proceed with it.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I hope the request will be made to lay aside the unfinished business temporarily, if this matter is going to be taken up.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I am not opposed to the request of the Senator from Idaho, but I should not be willing to grant unanimous consent, except with the understanding that, after his request shall have been disposed of, we resume the consideration of the pending bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate will have to lay aside the unfinished business temporarily for that purpose, or the unfinished business will be displaced.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I would suggest to the Senator from Texas to ask that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

Mr. SHEPPARD. If the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside, will it then be resumed after the matter moved by the Senator from Idaho shall have been disposed of?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be, if it is laid aside especially for that purpose.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Then I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside specifically for the consideration of this order, with the understanding that the consideration of the unfinished business is to be resumed after the order is disposed of.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the bill under consideration will be temporarily laid aside for the consideration of the motion of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH]. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The Senator from Idaho moves that 5,000 additional copies of the document referred to by him be printed, as the Chair understands, within the cost of $200.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Is that put in the form of a motion? I would suggest that the Senator ask unanimous consent that that be done.

Mr. BORAH. Then, I ask unanimous consent that 5,000 additional copies of the report of the Federal Trade Commission on profiteering be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. It is so ordered.

STIMULATION OF AGRICULTURE.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Now, I ask that we proceed with the consideration of House bill 11945.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the title of the bill now under consideration.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 11945) to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to carry out, during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, the purposes of the act entitled "An act to provide further for the national security and defense by stimulating agriculture and facilitating the distribution of agricultural products."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that the bill has been read.

Mr. PENROSE. Not all of the bill has been read, Mr. President. I do not understand that the bill has been completely read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is now informed that not all of the bill, but only a portion of it, has been read.

Mr. THOMPSON and Mr. CURTIS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair recognizes the senior Senator from Kansas.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. President, this afternoon I submitted a report from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, being a resolution (S. Res. 278) to pay the funeral expenses of the late Senator TILLMAN; and that resolution went to the calendar. I should like to have that resolution now considered and to have the unfinished business temporarily laid aside for that purpose.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I rise to a question of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania will state it.

Mr. PENROSE. The pending bill has been presented to the Senate but has not yet been read to the Senate. I ask for the reading of the bill. I am informed that the Secretary did not get beyond page 4 in the reading.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that the Secretary reached the bottom of page 5 in the reading of the bill.

Mr. PENROSE. I suggest that the Secretary proceed with the reading of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has directed the Secretary to proceed with the reading of the bill, and he will proceed without interruption until the bill shall have been read.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the bill under the regular order.

The Secretary resumed and concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. PENROSE, Mr. CURTIS, and Mr. FLETCHER addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. CURTIS. May I ask the Senator from Pennsylvania to yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. PENROSE. I yield.

Mr. CURTIS. I should like to offer an amendment merely to have it printed and have it pending.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, permission will be granted.

Mr. CURTIS. I should like to have the amendment read.

Mr. PENROSE. Let it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary wil read the proposed amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 1, line 7, after the word "security," it is proposed to insert "or such other security as may be satisfactory to the Secretary of Agriculture."

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Pennsylvania allow me to interrupt him to suggest, inasmuch as the Senator from Texas can not hope to get the bill acted on this evening, that he lay it aside and allow me to take up the bill upon which I have been endeavoring to secure action during the day, if that is possible?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Florida to make that request?

Mr. FLETCHER. I wish to suggest that perhaps the Senator from Texas would be willing to lay the unfinished business aside temporarily.

Mr. PENROSE. I do not care, Mr. President; it is a matter of indifference to me what the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD] does with his bill. The bill is such an ill-advised measure, supplementing, as it pretends, the general Agricultural appropriation bill which has recently passed Congress, that I have some observations to make to which I invite the attention of the American people. I am always brief, and the Senator from Florida need not be alarmed.

I consider that in the general Agricultural appropriation bill, recently passed and now before the President, and in this alleged supplemental bill for stimulating agriculture there is more wanton waste of the public money than in any measure that has been pending before the American Congress for a long time.

I have long believed, Mr. President, that the bill for the Agricultural Department approximated about as nearly a condition of departmental graft as it is possible to approximate without actually involving the participants in legal proceedings. We only have to examine some of these items to realize their wastefulness. There are in the two bills—the amount can easily be estimated—a number of millions of dollars—I hesitate to say how many—which, in my opinion, are practically being poured into the gutter. Three hundred and ninety-four thousand dollars are appropriated to investigate the habits of coyotes and prairie dogs in the general Agricultural appropriation bill, while——

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I understand the President has vetoed that bill.

Mr. PENROSE. Not on account of that very commendable feature, doubtless in his mind, regarding the investigation of coyotes and prairie dogs, but on account of the amendment fixing the price of wheat.

There is another item to investigate—oysters. Why, Mr. President, men have been eating oysters for several million years. We find oyster shells among the bones and relics of primeval man. The oyster is the original food of man, together with fish and other things that he could reach with his primitive weapons. Immense heaps of shells, surviving many centuries, occur along our seacoast, and yet, in the midst of this great war crisis, the Agricultural Department asks for a considerable appropriation to investigate oysters! Such propositions are so ridiculous at this time of stress, Mr. President, that I want to address the Senate at length upon it and others equally absurd, and I intend to do so, not now, perhaps, but at a time convenient to the Senate and to myself, a fitting time, when there are more Senators present than there are to-night, because, while some Senators are disposed to take a humorous view of the nearly half million dollars to investigate coyotes and prairie dogs, and I can not blame them, yet I consider it a somewhat serious matter, as an evidence of waste running in many other directions.

The people are being appealed to for liberty loans; three issues of them have been made, and another one is coming. We read a great deal about the conscription of wealth and the enormous sums that must be taken out of the pockets of the taxpayers to meet the urgent necessities of this great war, and it is somewhat disheartening to find that slackers and those perhaps who want to avoid the draft are in deferred classes while they investigate prairie dogs and oysters.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. PENROSE. I yield.

Mr. REED. The remarks of the Senator just made perhaps throw some light upon the proviso in the second page of this bill, which reads:

Provided, That no part of the money hereby appropriated shall be used in paying salary or expenses of any man who on account of employment in which he is or may be engaged under the provisions of this act has been or shall hereafter be certified by the Secretary of Agriculture, or by any other official of the Department of Agriculture, for deferred classification.

I did not understand that provision until the Senator's remark, and it occurred to me that perhaps the House of Representatives was on the track of these very gentlemen when they put that proviso in. The Senate committee attempts to strike it out.

Mr. PENROSE. Yes. Of course, the Agricultural Department would place these men in the deferred class, and doubtless the argument will be made, Mr. President, that they would be properly put in the deferred class because of peculiar talent. Everybody is not accustomed to examine these vermin with a microscope, and some people are too slow of foot or too uncertain of aim to capture them, and it might be that very many substantial favors could be conferred on slackers, so that they might go to our forest reserves and the vast stretches of our western prairies and investigate the habits of the fugitive squirrel and the evasive coyote. So that I rise in entire sincerity to discuss this matter.

Mr. President, we talk about the troubles of the Bolsheviki and the condition of the Russian Government. To my mind there is nothing more ridiculous in any proposition pending in the Russian Assembly than many of the items in this Agricultural bill in this great war crisis, when every dollar of the taxpayer's money, borrowed or taken from him in taxes, should be applied to strictly war purposes.

The city of Philadelphia, the third city in the country, has been notified by the Treasury Department, through its Securities Corporation, that that great municipality shall not be permitted to go on with certain improvements. Either the securities will not be indorsed or, through priority orders and other arbitrary powers of these autocratic agencies that have been set up over us in the last eight or nine months, they will be prevented from going on with the work. The city had spent thousands of dollars, and the people were anxiously awaiting for the development of a system of transportation which would solve many of the problems confronting in the most acute form that great metropolitan center of nearly 2,000,000 people; and yet they are held up, and unable to go on with those improvements, while the Senator from Texas is anxious to encourage the Department of Agriculture to squander millions in the investigation of all kinds of insects and vermin.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SWANSON in the chair). Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. PENROSE. I yield for a question.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Is that really what is troubling the Senator? Is it not the fact that there is a prohibition amendment on this bill that arouses the opposition of the Senator?

Mr. PENROSE. Well, that is objectionable to me in its present form, I will tell the Senator candidly, but I have not reached that part of the bill yet.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, if the prohibition amendment were not on the bill, I imagine the Senator would swallow the whole measure—coyotes, minks, oysters, and all. [Laughter.]

Mr. PENROSE. The Senator is entirely mistaken. He works prohibition overtime, and he sits in this Chamber apparently without a thought about any of the burdens of statesmanship which the rest of us are endeavoring to carry to the best of our ability, or some of us. He does not betray the slightest anxiety regarding these great supply bills and these great pieces of general legislation that seem to be so urgently required. He has a monomania on the subject, and if we ever should have national prohibition I can not help extending him my sincere sympathy, because he will be out of a job. [Laughter.]

But I have not reached the latter part of the bill, and I can not do it right way, either, because it is going to take a little time to discuss the first part of the bill.

But, Mr. President, the reason why I feel obliged to express my views is that I admit that my patience is exhausted. I have sat here for a year and voted with a solemn face and with great compunction of conscience for more measures that met my disapproval than I have ever done in the preceding 22 years of my membership in this body. I have had a disposition, like most of us have, to let the administration go a certain distance and see how they were going to make out; but to my mind the spell is broken and the limit has been reached. I will say candidly to the Senator from Texas that while this Agricultural bill may to many seem somewhat minor in importance, because wastefulness is not important with the Senator from Texas or the Democratic majority at this time, the ridiculous character of many of the items contained in it has exhausted my patience. When I read the bill the other day, I was about to address the Senate upon it; but some other Senator had the floor, and I could not wait until he was through, and so I left.

There can be no excuse for these lump sums being awarded to the Department of Agriculture without any segregation and without any necessity. It seems to me that the Department of Agriculture has gone crazy on investigations. I do not believe there is a subject in the encyclopedia or the dictionary that some one in the Department of Agriculture would not be willing to investigate with a small appropriation. It is not necessary that the subject investigated should come within the scope of the department. They range all the way from reindeer in Alaska to oysters out beyond the 3-mile limit.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for an inquiry?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. PENROSE. Yes.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to hear the Senator, with his knowledge of multifarious subjects, enlighten us on the necessity of $52,950 to educate the American people upon how to make cottage cheese. [Laughter.]

Mr. PENROSE. I was going to touch on that item, and I am glad the Senator has called my attention to it. Cottage cheese has probably been made for 10,000 years and more, ever since the cow and the ox have accompanied the Aryan race in its journeys westward.

Mr. REED. Before that—ever since milk soured. [Laughter.]

Mr. PENROSE. Yes; ever since milk soured; and just what new light the department expects to throw upon it I do not know. They do not even say what they are going to do with it. Perhaps they are going to make ointment out of it, and suggest giving it up as a food and plastering it over a sore. I do not know. I should think, maybe, in an experience of many thousand years some little learning might have been accumulated about cottage cheese. Perhaps they intend to send a commission to Egypt to look at the ancient hieroglyphics and the Assyrian relics to see what they can learn about the practices of those ancient peoples concerning cottage cheese. It may be.

The Senator has propounded a question to me. I will address one to him, coming as he does from a State of vast prairies, now with the wilderness redeemed and blossoming with the fruits of the farm; but here in this craze for investigation I find this item:

For investigating the food habits of North American birds and mammals in relation to agriculture, horticulture, and forestry, including experiments and demonstrations in the destroying of wolves, coyotes, prairie dogs, and other animals injurious to agriculture and animal husbandry, and for investigations and experiments in connection with the rearing of fur-bearing animals, including mink and marten, $394,820.

I do not know why they split the sum. I do not know whether the Senator from Illinois has had any experience in raising minks or marten or whether they are readily domesticated.

Mr. President, it is well known that every western State has a bounty on these animals; that it will pay any boy or half-grown young man to go out with a gun and kill the coyotes and the other four-legged vermin, and he can go to the county seat and get his reward; and I have even known men in the State of Idaho and elsewhere to put false ears on artificial scalps and get a little additional reward; so it is a lucrative business.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I think there is a rule of the Senate against assailing the character of a State. [Laughter.]

Mr. PENROSE. This was so long ago that perhaps the State has recovered from that habit; but I have no doubt the Senator has heard of similar cases.

Mr. President, this supplemental bill, alleged to stimulate agriculture, simply carries on this craze for investigation—nothing else and nothing more. It duplicates and increases the many items which are in the original bill. Here in this war crisis, when our great cities are not permitted to go on with improvements, and when the States are very largely making liberal appropriations for these investigations, we have a duplication of effort, to the extent of large sums, which in the aggregate total several million dollars.

The average Senator heretofore has hesitated to vote against this measure because most of our States have large agricultural interests. Pennsylvania, which I represent in part, ordinarily looked on as principally a manufacturing State, is first in some items of agricultural production, and third and fourth, and so on down the line, in other items; and I feel as deeply interested in the success of the agricultural people of our country, even from a local or sectional point of view, as do the Senators from Iowa or Kansas or any more strictly agricultural States. So that the disposition has been to go along in an easy way and vote for these appropriations; but I, for one, think the time has come to call a halt.

The abuse reaches the verge of a scandal. It can not be defended. Mark Twain could have written an account of this measure in his peculiar vein which would constitute one of the greatest books of humor ever published in the English language; and yet these bills have been going through without discussion or comment. It was the ridiculous character of many, if not most, of these items that in this instance did exhaust my patience; and I made a solemn pledge to myself that from now on I was not going to sit silently by while this kind of legislation passed, I do not care what its character is, or how small or how large the item is, or whether it is a proposition of Government ownership, in my opinion unnecessary, or of price control, in my opinion vicious in its effect.

I consider—and I say it advisedly, and at the proper time and upon another occasion I intend to address the Senate at length upon it—that we are fighting this whole war upon false economic principles. There has been, in my opinion, no necessity for all these autocratic authorities, chiefly held by persons absolutely ignorant of the duties confided to them, and even ostensibly selected because they knew nothing of the duties confided to them, and so from their very ignorance they would be unprejudiced. These men have been administering food control and fuel control and price control in scores of directions which are rapidly becoming a scandal in the United States, and are doing more to stimulate consumption and curtail production than any other method that could be devised.

Price fixing, Mr. President, which interferes with the fundamental laws of supply and demand, is the most vicious policy that the Government has indulged in. Low prices curtail production and stimulate consumption; and then, to restrict consumption, we have these food boards and fuel boards, with appropriations running into ten and twenty and fifty million dollars, to keep people from consuming. Why, Mr. President, the way to keep too much sugar from being consumed is for sugar to go up in price. Then it will automatically regulate itself, and the consumption will be curtailed, and the excess profits will pour into the Treasury of the United States. I for one believe that the business men of America would rather be taxed 75 per cent of all their profits and let the ordinary economic currents of business run along in their natural courses than to submit to all this bad economic restriction and regulation.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KING in the chair). Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. PENROSE. Yes.

Mr. MYERS. The Senator's theory, then, is that he would curtail the use of food by putting it beyond the reach of poor people, so that they would not be able to get it?

Mr. PENROSE. Oh, no. That is an entire assumption of the Senator from Montana, that it would be beyond the reach of poor people. I simply say that as a commodity like sugar goes up it will automatically curtail the consumption, and the price will go down. In other words, we have revived and put in practice economic doctrines that it was supposed men had forgotten and had considered exploded long ago.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. PENROSE. Yes.

Mr. GORE. I should like to say to the Senator that I am anxious at least to make an effort to bring up House bill 12405. It is a bill authorizing the exclusion of certain aliens and anarchists. It has passed the House. It has been recommended by the Committee on Immigration without amendment, and I should like very much to have an opportunity to pass it so that the Presiding Officer could sign it before we take our recess to-night.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I recognize that it will be a long time before this bill passes, and I will doubtless have other opportunities to address the Senate upon it, and if it is any accommodation to the Senator I will yield the floor.

Mr. GORE. I should like very much to have an opportunity at least to present the matter to the Senate and discharge my duty in the premises.

Mr. PENROSE. Is this bill to be temporarily laid aside?

Mr. GORE. I hope the Senator from Texas will agree to that course.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I would not object to laying the bill temporarily aside in behalf of any urgent measure, with the understanding that the consideration of this bill is to be resumed before adjournment, so that it will be the unfinished business.

Mr. PENROSE. The Senator can not have any such understanding about the bill.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I am aware of that fact.

Mr. PENROSE. Then the Senator is expressing a vain hope about an understanding.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I was aware of that before I expressed it.

Mr. PENROSE. If the Senator will undertake to amend the bill eliminating all these wasteful and ill-advised appropriations I would carefully consider with the Senator the idea of bringing the bill up for early consideration.

Mr. SHEPPARD. The bill is reported from the Agricultural Committee of the Senate.

Mr. PENROSE. I know.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I am not authorized to eliminate anything from the bill.

Mr. PENROSE. The Senator has assumed paternity of the bill by calling it up, as it seems to be left on his doorstep without a father. The Senator has assumed that responsibility.

Mr. SHEPPARD. My paternity does not extend that far.

Mr. PENROSE. I did not know. I supposed when the Senator called the bill up he had enough interest in it to speak for its friends, and if he is willing to help me to reduce or entirely eliminate some of these wasteful items——

Mr. SHEPPARD. I am willing to help the Senator to reduce; it will do him personally an immense amount of good. [Laughter.]

Mr. PENROSE. It will help to bring about the final consideration of the bill.

Mr. President, I dislike to detain the Senate by a repetition of some of these items. Here they start in to provide for the necessary expenses and the investigation of fruit trees, grain, cotton, tobacco, vegetables, grasses, forage, drugs, medicinal, poisonous, fibrous, and other plants and plant industries, and in cooperation with other branches of the department, the State experiment stations, and practical farmers, and for the erection of necessary farm buildings all over the United States. This wasteful proposition of erecting farm buildings is proposed in this measure.

I want to say, Mr. President, and I had intended saying it before I was interrupted, and my attention is called to it by the mention of tobacco, there is hardly one of these arbitrary orders by these autocratic authorities that, in many cases, at least, is not revoked a few days after it is made. We all recall that lamentable fiasco in the original coal order about the closing-down days, made against the protest of the Senate of the United States, and quickly revoked after it had been made. Only the other day an order regarding sugar was represented to me by a delegation of tobacco manufacturers from North Carolina, Pennsylvania, Virginia, and other tobacco growing and manufacturing States as likely absolutely to paralyze the tobacco industry unless it was revised.

Mr. OVERMAN. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. THOMPSON. May I ask the Senator before he submits that motion——

Mr. JONES of Washington. The motion is not debatable. I make a point of order.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Will the Senator from North Carolina withhold the motion for just a few minutes, that I may call attention to a ruling by the Chair for the reason that the ruling is erroneous. I ask the Senator from North Carolina to yield just for five minutes.

Mr. OVERMAN. I will yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I was out of the Senate at the time the concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 20) was presented under which it was proposed that by the concurrent action of both Houses Congress should adjourn until the 12th of August. The Chair ruled that debate was out of order upon that concurrent resolution, and the ruling of the Chair was based upon Rule XXII of the Senate.

I wish to call attention to the fact that Rule XXII does not apply to a concurrent resolution. It applies to a motion to adjourn and a motion to recess, which are not debatable. The Constitution of the United States forbids a motion by the Senate to adjourn for more than three days. The Senate can not recess; it can not adjourn on its own accord for more than three days; it requires a concurrent resolution. A concurrent resolution is as different from a motion as the Constitution is from an act of Congress, and Rule XXII does not apply to concurrent resolutions. I thought that the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] intended to appeal from the decision of the Chair, or else I should have done so myself.

I was unwilling for the session of the Senate to adjourn to-day without this expression on my part of dissent from the ruling of the Chair and my insistence that a concurrent resolution which would carry the Senate out of session, if the House concurred, for 30 days, or perhaps 60 or 90 days or 4 months, is debatable. I wish to enter my dissent from any view that such a serious action on the part of the Senate could be had without debate.

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

Mr. OVERMAN. I insist on my motion that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 10 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, July 8, 1918, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, July 6, 1918.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou who workest ever in and through all things and art mighty to deliver, help us to open wide the portals of our souls that we may be susceptible to the spiritual forces of which we are so closely allied; that we may be guided to a happy solution of the problems which confront us and thus be instruments in Thy hands for the furtherance of Thy will and good purposes; in the spirit of the Master. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. LAZARO, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 12580. An act to authorize an additional issue of bonds to meet expenditures for the national security and defense, and, for the purpose of assisting in the prosecution of the war, to extend additional credit to foreign governments, and for other purposes; and

H. R. 10069. An act making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bill of the following title:

S. 3929. An act for the construction of a private conduit across Michigan Avenue NE., in the District of Columbia.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Tulley, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 3220. An act authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to make investigations, through the Bureau of Mines, of lignite coals and peat to determine the practicability of their utilization as a fuel and in producing commercial products.

SENATE BILL AND JOINT RESOLUTION REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bill and joint resolution of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees, as indicated below:

S. 3220. An act authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to make investigations, through the Bureau of Mines, of lignite coals and peat to determine the practicability of their utilization as a fuel and in producing commercial products; to the Committee on Mines and Mining.

S. J. Res. 156. Joint resolution to suspend the requirements of annual assessment work on mining claims during the continuation of the war in which the United States is now engaged and until midnight of December 31 of the year following that in which such war is concluded; to the Committeee on Mines and Mining.

CORRECTION.

Mr. LAZARO. Mr. Speaker, on page 8735 of the RECORD of July 5, 1918, on the vote on the telephone and telegraph bill, my colleague Mr. MARTIN, of Louisiana, is recorded as not having voted. Mr. MARTIN had to leave the House on account of illness in his family, and he asked me to pair him in favor of the bill. There was no way of doing that, however, and had be been present, he would have voted for the resolution.

PENSIONS.

Mr. SHOUSE. Mr. Speaker, I present for printing under the rule a conference report upon the bill (H. R. 12229) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War, and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL—CONFERENCE REPORT (NO. 740).

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report upon the bill (H. R. 9054) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and I ask that the statement and conference report be read.

The Clerk read the conference report and the statement.

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9054) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to report to their respective Houses as follows:

That they are unable to reach an agreement on Senate amendment No. 44.

A. F. LEVER,
GORDON LEE,
E. S. CANDLER,
G. N. HAUGEN,
J. C. MCLAUGHLIN,
Managers on the part of the House.
T. P. GORE,
E. D. SMITH,
HOKE SMITH,
A. J. GRONNA,
G. W. NORRIS,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

STATEMENT.

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9054) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and for other purposes, submit the following statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon by the conference committee and submitted in the accompanying conference report as to each of the amendments of the Senate, namely:

On amendment No. 44: This amendment amends section 14 of the food-control act, approved August 10, 1917, by fixing the guaranteed minimum price of wheat for the crop of 1918 at $2.50 per bushel, based on No. 2 northern spring or its equivalent; said price to be paid at the local elevator or the local railway market. The conferees have been unable to agree as to this amendment.

A. F. LEVER,
GORDON LEE,
E. S. CANDLER,
G. N. HAUGEN,
J. C. MCLAUGHLIN,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House further insist upon its disagreement to amendment No. 44 and ask for a further conference.

Mr. FULLER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a preferential motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN], a member of the committee, has the right to recognition.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a preferential motion.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I have the motion to recede and concur with an amendment.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Michigan to make the preferential motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina moves that the House further insist upon its disagreement to amendment No. 44 and ask for a further conference, and the gentleman from Michigan makes a preferential motion, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. MCLAUGHLIN of Michigan moves to concur in Senate amendment No. 44 with an amendment as follows: Page 100, line 23, after the word "than," strike out the remainder of line 23 and all of lines 24 and 25 and insert the following: "$2.40 per bushel at the principal interior primary markets designated by the President by proclamation issued by him February 21, 1918, and at such other places as the President may designate."

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, a parliametary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. FESS. Has not the House already disagreed to this amendment?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. FESS. Then, should not the motion be to recede and concur?

The SPEAKER. That is correct; the Chair will put the motion correctly when it is voted upon.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, I will ask the gentleman if we can not agree upon some time for debate?

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I suggest that we have one hour of debate, one-half hour on each side.

Mr. LEVER. That is agreeable to me.

Mr. KITCHIN. That means on all of the amendments?

Mr. HAUGEN. On all of the amendments.

Mr. KITCHIN. And that the previous question shall be considered as ordered upon all amendments?

Mr. HAUGEN. Very well.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that debate upon these motions and all other motions end at the conclusion of one hour, that the previous question be considered as ordered at that time, and that one-half of the time be controlled by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN] and one-half by myself.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent that debate upon these motions shall extend for one hour, half of that time to be controlled by himself and half by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN], and that at the end of the hour the previous question shall be considered as ordered. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes of my time to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. YOUNG].

Mr. MORGAN rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Oklahoma rise?

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Speaker, I rise to offer an amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MCLAUGHLIN].

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that a motion to amend a motion to concur with an amendment is not in order. It is an amendment in the third degree.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Speaker, I looked up this question of the right to amend the amendment offered to an amendment when it was up before, and the exact situation as we have it now was presented then. Mr. MCLAUGHLIN offered his amendment and I offered to amend that with an amendment.

Mr. WALSH. Well, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman has not been yielded time to offer an amendment.

Mr. MORGAN. I do not need to have time yielded.

Mr. WALSH. Yes; the gentleman does.

Mr. MORGAN. I move, Mr. Speaker, to amend the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MCLAUGHLIN] by striking out the words and figures "$2.40" and insert "$2.50" in lieu thereof.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order against that. The gentleman can not do that at this time. He must be yielded time to do that, and I had the floor.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Speaker, this is a preferential motion.

The SPEAKER. The Chair knows; but the gentleman from Michigan made a preferential motion.

Mr. MORGAN. Yes; but the amendment to concur with an amendment is subject to an amendment. I am certain of that, because I have looked it up very carefully, and it has been decided over and over again.

Mr. LEVER. I may say to the gentleman from Oklahoma, in addition, if that amendment is offered I propose to make a point of order against it because it is increasing the price from $2.50, which is the price in disagreement, to $2.65.

Mr. MORGAN. I can do that. You can raise the price above or you can lower it. There is nothing against increasing it. Now, the House did not fix any price on wheat——

The SPEAKER. Has the gentleman any authority?

Mr. MORGAN. I would like to have Volume V of Hinds' Precedents.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, if the Chair will hear me. I merely rise out of regard to parliamentary integrity of our rulings. I do not agree with the gentleman from Texas that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma is in the third degree. We have before the House an original proposition.

The SPEAKER. What is the original proposition?

Mr. STAFFORD. The original proposition is the Senate amendment No. 44 which was never heretofore considered.

The SPEAKER. That is for $2.50 wheat.

Mr. STAFFORD. It is more than for $2.50——

The SPEAKER. The Chair knows, but the Chair's inquiry was if the Senate amendment is for the $2.50 wheat.

Mr. STAFFORD. That is one provision in Senate amendment No. 44, which relates to other provisions besides merely the price of wheat.

The SPEAKER. The Chair knows, but the Chair wanted to know in order to decide the point.

Mr. STAFFORD. It is in Senate amendment fixing the price at $2.50. Here is an original proposition submitted to the House for the first time for its consideration. The question before the Speaker for determination is not the question as to whether the conferees might exceed their authority if they went beyond the price of $2.50. It is an original proposition, as if this bill had been referred to the Committee on Agriculture, brought back to the House, came up in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and was pending for amendment. Now it is open for amendment. The gentleman from Michigan offers one amendment within his right. He reduces the amount, and I respectfully contend that the gentleman from Oklahoma has authority to increase the price just as any Member would have the right to increase the price in a House bill, and this must be considered as a House bill, because it is an original proposition, no matter even though it goes way beyond the amount fixed by the Senate. We are not limited in the determination of this Senate amendment as to anything the Senate agreed to. We are acting as a body of original jurisdiction. The conferees may limit it and say that they can not go beyond a certain amount. I would not say even then the conferees could not go beyond $2.50 for the reason that there has been no amount in disagreement between the two bodies. Now, the question is whether it is in the third degree. Here is an original proposition coming before the House. It is not an amendment, it is an original proposition. The gentleman from Michigan has a right to offer an amendment. The gentleman from Oklahoma has a right to offer an amendment to that amendment. That is an amendment in the second degree, not in the third degree.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman contend that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma is a preferential motion?

Mr. STAFFORD. It is an amendment.

Mr. WALSH. I say, does the gentleman contend this is a preferential motion?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes; I do.

Mr. WALSH. And that you can have two preferential motions pending on a conference report?

Mr. STAFFORD. It is an amendment to a preferential motion of the gentleman from Michigan. The only question before the Speaker is whether it is an amendment to a preferential motion.

Mr. WALSH. Well, that does not make it preferential.

Mr. STAFFORD. To change the amount. As to the amendment of the gentleman from Oklahoma, I do not agree with the provision at all, and I am only arguing whether it is right to do this so as to have a decision made along the proper line. He merely changes the amount. Would any gentleman contend it would not be in the authority of any Member of the House to change the amount in the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan from $2.40 to $2.45?

Mr. GARNER. Of course you could not.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman yield for an inquiry?

Mr. STAFFORD. I will.

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman, in my judgment, makes this mistake in assuming there is before the House simply an amendment to the Senate amendment. There is not. There has been a conference upon the disagreement between the two Houses. That is a disagreement that is represented by the existing guarantee of $2, and the Senate amendment makes it $2.50. Now, the conferees could not agree outside of this limitation if they wanted to do so. Manifestly what the conferees could not do can not be done by a preferential motion to——

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman will permit, where is there anything in the disagreement between the two bodies, as far as the Senate amendment, No. 44, which we are considering, which limits the price to $2?

Mr. SHERLEY. Because the existing law fixes it at $2. The proposal of the Senate is to change that and make it $2.50. Now, the House disagrees to the Senate amendment and sent the bill to conference.

Now, what was the issue? The issue was whether you should have $2.50 wheat or the existing law guaranty of $2. Everybody knows that. In that range the conferees had liberty to agree or disagree. They reported this agreement. Now, it is in order, I say, to move to insist on the disagreement or to move to concur or to concur with an amendment, provided the amendment be such as the conferees themselves could have written into the bill.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Speaker, I have an authortiy here now that I would like to read.

The SPEAKER. One thing at a time. The Chair will recognize the gentleman at the proper time.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Speaker, as I understand it I have offered a preferential motion to the McLaughlin amendment, and I claim that it is in order and should be voted on first and discussed first. I have the authority here just as plain as black and white. As I understood, he raised the point of order against my amendment being in order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will read it.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, let me submit this to the Chair so that we may proceed regularly here. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MORGAN] has not offered his amendment. It is not before the House.

Mr. MORGAN. I beg your pardon.

Mr. LEVER. And the gentleman has no time in which to offer the amendment unless he is yielded time by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN].

Mr. MORGAN. I have a right to offer it.

Mr. LEVER. The gentleman can discuss the point of order when it comes up.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield in that particular? Was it not the understanding of the unanimous consent agreement that Members would have the right to offer amendments during the hour?

Mr. WALSH. When they were yielded to.

Mr. STAFFORD. Not when they were yielded to.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I think the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER] is entirely right. We have a unanimous consent agreement that there will be one hour of discussion, one-half to be controlled by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER] and one-half by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN], and on the preferential motion; and at the end of that time the previous question shall be considered as ordered on that motion and on all other motions. Now, then, no man has the right to offer an amendment now, because the unanimous consent agreement prevents that, and the only way the gentleman from Oklahoma can offer that amendment under this unanimous consent agreement is to get time either from the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER], who has control of half of it, or time from the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN]. And that is exactly the procedure we took when this matter was before the House previously.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will.

Mr. STAFFORD. Did not the gentleman in his request for unanimous consent ask that the previous question should be ordered not only on the amendment but on all amendments?

Mr. KITCHIN. All amendments.

Mr. STAFFORD. And that was predicated on the idea that other amendments would be offered.

Mr. KITCHIN. And that meant, under the unanimous consent agreement for one hour, to be controlled by the respective gentlemen, that if a Member got time from either one of these gentlemen he could offer his amendment, and the previous question would be considered as ordered on that amendment and on any other amendment a gentleman might offer when he got the time from one of these two gentlemen who control it; and I would say to the Speaker that this is exactly the procedure and the rulings of the Speaker when we had this discussion up before.

Mr. MORGAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will.

Mr. MORGAN. When we had it up before the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. MCLAUGHLIN) offered a motion. I offered to amend his motion, just as I have to-day.

Mr. KITCHIN. But you offered it in the time that was allotted to you.

Mr. MORGAN. No, sir. I offered it before there was any discussion.

Mr. KITCHIN. I happened to be in the chair at that time, and I remember the procedure very well, and that was the understanding of the House and that was the ruling of the Chair, that you had to get the time.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, let us have the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is the regular order, and if everybody will sit down, except the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MORGAN], and let him make his statement the Chair will be very much obliged.

Mr. MORGAN. Now, Mr. Speaker, I refer you to Hinds' Precedents, volume 5, page 608, as follows:

6175. A motion being made to agree to an amendment of the other House with an amendment, it is in order to perfect that amendment by another amendment and a substitute. On April 22, 1897, the House was in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, considering the Senate amendments to the Indian appropriation bill, and the Clerk had read this amendment:

"That the Secretary of the Interior shall, within 60 days after the passage of this act, establish and thereafter maintain at the city of Omaha, in the State of Nebraska, a warehouse for Indian supplies, from which distribution shall be made to such Indian tribes of the West and Northwest as the Secretary of the Interior may direct."

Mr. Jonathan P. Dolliver, of Iowa, moved to recommend concurrence in this amendment, with an amendment striking out "Omaha," etc., and inserting "Sioux City," etc.

Mr. John F. Shafroth, of Colorado, moved an amendment to Mr. Dolliver's amendment, striking out "Sioux City" and inserting "Denver."

Mr. James S. Sherman raised a point of order against this amendment.

The Chairman said:

"The Chair is of the opinion that the amendment of the Senate must be treated as a part of the text of the bill, and that a second amendment would be admissible under the rules and practice of the House. * * * The Chair is under the impression that the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Dolliver] was the first proposition to concur with an amendment, and to that an amendment is offered by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. Shafroth]."

Thereupon Mr. Richard Bartholdt moved a substitute for Mr. Dolliver's amendment, providing for "St. Louis" instead of "Omaha."

This substitute was entertained.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman permit an inquiry?

Mr. MORGAN. I will.

Mr. SHERLEY. I think the whole matter can be settled by unanimous-consent agreement. I ask unanimous consent that the motion of the gentleman from Iowa, having been made, shall be pending, and that the gentleman from Oklahoma's motion as a substitute be pending, and that the previous question be considered as ordered on these preferential motions and amendments.

As I understand it, it is the desire on the part of the minority simply to get a vote on the two proposals, and that will save time, and time is important. That lets your motion come in.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. MORGAN. When would it be proper to move to concur in Senate amendment No. 44?

Mr. SHERLEY. Oh, well, it would have been proper to have moved it at any time; but as I understand it, the gentleman does not want to do that. He wants to have $2.65. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MCLAUGHLIN] wants $2.40. We can get a vote on either and the vote settles the decision of the House. If they are voted down it then puts the House in the position of insisting on its position in opposition to the Senate amendment.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. In answer to the interrogatory of the gentleman from Oklahoma, is it not true that it would be in order at this time to move to concur in the Senate amendment?

Mr. SHERLEY. Well, I think it would.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky, in order to cut the Gordian knot of this difficulty——

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MORGAN. Would it be proper at this time for me to offer an amendment——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] asks unanimous consent to permit you to do it.

Mr. MORGAN. If this consent is agreed to, would there be any time before a final vote when it would be proper to offer to concur in Senate amendment numbered 44; and if so, when?

The SPEAKER. What does the gentleman mean—to make another motion to concur?

Mr. MORGAN. Suppose my amendment is allowed, and it is voted down, and the McLaughlin amendment is voted down. Then would it be proper to offer an amendment to concur in Senate amendment numbered 44?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will decide that when he gets to it. It is not up now.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Oklahoma be permitted to offer his amendment, amending the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan, which amends the Senate amendment. Is there objection?

Mr. HAUGEN. It will be offered as a substitute.

The SPEAKER. Well, it is as broad as it is long.

Mr. SHERLEY. I not only said as a substitute, but I then made the proposition that the previous question should be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. Yes; and that the previous question should be considered as ordered.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HAUGEN. Would the amendment of the gentleman from Oklahoma come first as a substitute?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. If the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky is carried, would that prevent a motion to concur in the Senate amendment?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state, as he stated a while ago, that he would decide that when we came to it.

Mr. SHERLEY. I include that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky puts that in. If the amendment of the gentleman from Oklahoma fails and the motion of the gentleman from Michigan fails, then the motion to concur can be made if anybody wants to make it.

Mr. HAUGEN. I suggest that the previous question be ordered on all amendments.

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. HAUGEN. I take it that if either of the amendments is adopted, that disposes of it. If we have fixed the price, that disposes of the whole matter. If the motion of the gentleman from Oklahoma carries——

The SPEAKER. That is not enough. The Chair will decide that when he comes to it.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. YOUNG] has been yielded time by the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture. Must he wait now before he begins to consume that time until it is determined that no more amendments will be offered?

The SPEAKER. He will have to wait until these parliamentary things are cleared up. Now, the Chair wants to put that motion of the gentleman from Kentucky so that everybody will understand it, and let nobody interrupt the Chair. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MORGAN] be permitted to offer his amendment; that if all these amendments are voted down and the occasion occurs a flat motion to concur shall be in order and the previous question is ordered on the whole thing. Is there objection?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Reserving the right to object——

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order. We have used 30 minutes in trying to get some plan.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. As the Chair just suggested, if the first motion put is upon the amendment of the gentleman from Oklahoma for $2.65——

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The Chair suggested that the next motion would be $2.40.

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Why would it not, in natural order, be the motion to concur, which would be $2.50?

The SPEAKER. I know; but nobody ever made the motion to concur.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Then, Mr. Speaker, I make it now.

The SPEAKER. You can make that motion when these others are out of the way. When these other motions are out of the way I will recognize anybody to move to concur.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I was thinking that, as the Chair suggested, the first motion should be on the amendment of the gentleman from Oklahoma, $2.65, and the regular parliamentary order would be to take the one next in amount, $2.50, which is the motion to concur.

The SPEAKER. The regular parliamentary order is to take them up in the order in which they are offered.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina is recognized for 30 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. MORGAN. I do not object.

The SPEAKER. Let the Chair put this motion. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY]?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I do not understand the Chair's ruling. Will there be an opportunity for a motion to concur in the Senate amendment?

The SPEAKER. There will be if these others are voted out.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Not otherwise?

The SPEAKER. No. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER] is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. WALSH. You have not got consent yet.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MORGAN. Now, Mr. Speaker, can I offer my amendment?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will send his amendment up.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, this does not come out of my time?

The SPEAKER. Of course, it does not. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. MORGAN moves to amend the McLaughlin amendment by striking out "$2.40" and inserting in lieu thereof "$2.65."

The SPEAKER. Now, if the gentleman from South Carolina wants to use his time, he had better start.

Mr. LEVER. "The gentleman from South Carolina" has been trying to use his time. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. YOUNG].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, this mix-up in which we find ourselves this morning but demonstrates the fact that we made an egregious blunder about a year ago when we embarked on the proposition of price fixing on agricultural products. As long as we have that principle involved and written into our law every time a bill comes before this House fixing the prices of agricultural products we will have this same kind of controversy. What have we before us at this time? The price of wheat is already fixed at $2.20 a bushel, and this morning we have the proposition of a Senate amendment raising that price to $2.50, and then an amendment offered on this floor raising that price again to $2.65 a bushel. We must not forget that the citizens of this Nation are but human beings, and whenever you undertake to fix the price on a product that an individual citizen grows, it is but natural for that citizen, when it does not take any more printer's ink to raise that price, to want the price raised 30, 50, 75 cents or $1 a bushel, and agitation will begin to have that price raised.

So, from my point of view, standing as I stood a year ago, I believe the only solution of the question is to abandon the price-fixing proposition as applied to agricultural products. My State grows some wheat, all the way from 18,000,000 to 30,000,000 bushels annually. I have not had a line from that State saying that the farmers are dissatisfied with $2.20 a bushel, the price fixed by the President under the law which we passed. All the organization of the Food Department down here is based on that price. All the agreements with our allies, who must buy in great quantities, are based on $2.20. If at this time we undertake to raise the price from $2.20 to $2.50 or $2.65 we disorganize the whole scheme.

That is not all. If by this artificial method you raise the price of wheat to $2.50 or $2.65 a bushel, with the fifty-fifty order still in existence, you do another thing. You stilt the price of substitutes for wheat—barley, oats, rye, and corn.

I would like to put this question in all good faith: If this House to-day were confronted with a proposition, not to stilt the price of grain, but whether or not the $2.20 price fixed by the President of the Nation should prevail, or on the other hand, the fixing of the price of wheat should be abolished, how would you vote in that emergency? I do not believe there is a man in the House who comes from the wheat-producing section of the country, with the great crop now in sight of from 1,000,000,000 to 1,200,000,000 bushels according to the best estimates, who would dare give up the $2.20 price of wheat that has been guaranteed by the President of the Nation, and let wheat depend on the law of supply and demand for the price that the producer should get. I do not believe you would do it; and if you would not do it, knowing that this great crop has been raised, how can you in all good conscience say that $2.20 is not sufficient and that you will stilt it to $2.65? If I had my desire, gentlemen, I would abolish the price-fixing power as to agricultural products. [Applause.]

Mr. LEVER. I ask the gentleman from Iowa to use some of his time.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, this bill has been in conference now for about three months, or since the 5th of April. The conferees have tried to get together on this proposition, but their efforts have resulted in a disagreement. The Senate fixed the price of wheat at $2.50 for No. 2 wheat at the local markets. The President, in his proclamation February 21, 1918, fixed the price at $2.20 in Chicago and corresponding prices for No. 1 wheat in principal interior primary markets, a difference in price of 30 cents a bushel, and a difference of about 3 cents on grade, which makes a difference of about 33 cents, besides the difference in the freight rate from the local market to the interior market, which would in all make a difference in a number of instances of 40 cents a bushel. The proposition for this House to determine to-day is, Shall this bill be defeated, or are we going to compromise with the Senate and reach some agreement? If we are to compromise, if we are to come to an agreement, the only honorable and safe way seems for us to say to the Senate, "We propose to cut this thing in two." If we fix the price at $2.40 at the principal interior markets, on the basis of No. 2 wheat, we have met them half way. If we do that, I am quite certain, from what I learn from the conferees and from what I have read in the RECORD, that that proposition will be accepted by the conferees of the Senate. So the proposition for this House to determine now is, Shall we compromise by splitting the difference?

Mr. Speaker, what does this 20 cents a bushel amount to to the consumer, anyway? It takes about 5 bushels of wheat to make a barrel of flour. The American people consume about a barrel of flour a year per capita. A difference of 20 cents a bushel in the price of wheat makes a difference of a dollar a barrel in flour. A barrel of flour will make 600 loaves of bread. The increase amounts to less than one-sixth of 1 cent for a loaf of bread. But we are not making the bread out of wheat flour alone. We are using substitutes, about half wheat flour and half substitute. This cuts the increase down to only one-twelfth of 1 cent per loaf. Gentlemen, can we afford to defeat this bill simply for that one-twelfth of 1 cent a loaf, or $1 per capita? Remember also that about only half of the wheat that is grown is sold. Much of the other half is consumed by the producers, and the increase in cost affects only that part which is ground and sold. Gentlemen, when you consider the fact that all other industries all along the line are permitted to charge exorbitant prices and to extort unreasonable profits, is it fair to say to the wheat grower, "Your profit shall be limited to whatever the profit may be on wheat at $2.20 a bushel"? And remember that $2.20 a bushel does not give the farmer $2.20. No; freight, commission, and expense of handling is deducted from that $2.20, which leaves him so in many cases he receives less than $2 a bushel. And if you will consider the increased cost of labor and the increased cost of everything that enters into the production of wheat, I believe you will all admit that the farmer is entitled to a considerable increase. It may be that $2.40 or $2.50 is a high price, but prices are high on everything that we buy all along the line. May I call your attention to the report of the Federal Trade Commission issued recently?

On page 5 the report states that the profits made by concerns are attributable to inordinate greed and barefaced fraud. That is what the Federal Trade Commission has to say about others engaged in industrial pursuits. I am calling attention to this report because it is official, and I take it that it will be accepted by all as a statement of facts.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes.

Mr. COX. I want to ask a question for information. In the last few days I have received several letters from farmers in my district saying that they have reduced the grade of wheat in some manner so that it has reduced the price to $1.50 and $1.75 a bushel. I called up this morning the Food Administration and they seemed to know nothing about it. I tried to get in touch with the chief of the bureau in the Agricultural Department that has the grading of wheat in charge, and they did not know anything about it. Does the gentleman know anything about the grading of wheat that will materially reduce the price of wheat in our part of the country or in any other part of the country?

Mr. HAUGEN. A number of representatives of organizations—farmers and the elevator men throughout the country—appeared before the committee and complained about the grading of wheat. I understand that Mr. Brand, in charge of the grading, has modified it to some extent, and I also understand that the grain corporation took the matter out of Mr. Brand's hands and corrected the wrong by fixing the difference at 3 cents a bushel between No. 1 and No. 2 instead of 11 cents. But that is a matter now in the hands of the Department of Agriculture and Congress has no control over it, as the department has been given power to fix the grade.

Mr. MEEKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes.

Mr. MEEKER. Does not the gentleman think that with the labor emergency that is now on, trying to gather the harvest already grown, at the prices the farmers will be compelled to pay, $2.40 is a very low price for wheat? I saw last week crops in Pennsylvania going to waste because they could not get labor to harvest them.

Mr. HAUGEN. There is no way to estimate the cost of producing wheat. It is all a gamble. In some sections of the country the yield is 4 or 6 bushels to the acre, while in other sections it is 40 and 50 bushels. Land in some sections is $2 to $5 an acre, while in other sections it is as high as $300 an acre. Taking one year with another, as a general thing the wheat grower is not getting rich. Generally the prosperous farmers are those engaged in diversified crops; but, be that as it may, what we have to determine now is what disposition shall be made of the Agricultural bill. Are we going to defeat it or pass it? Evidently the Senate will adhere to its amendment or insist upon a compromise.

We have been in conference with the Senate three months, and I think I know something about what they are thinking. This proposition came up in the Senate about a week ago—the proposition was to recede—and the vote was 46 to 19 against receding; again, on July 3, the Senate voted on the proposition to recede and turned it down and refused to ask for a conference. That is the Senate's action. Clearly it is up to us to act. I purpose to meet them halfway rather than to take the chances of losing the whole bill.

Mr. Speaker, the time will not permit a lengthy discussion of this proposition. However, before I close I desire to call attention to the Federal Trade Commission report made June 29, 1918, to the Senate in response to the directions under Senate resolution 255 that it furnish the Senate with facts, figures, data, and information in its possession relative to profiteering. On page 9 it had this to report:

> Many of the industries are making unusual profit; some are showing outrageous ones. In an hour of national service and self-sacrifice profiteering may be defined not only as the taking of an exorbitant profit but should include a refusal to share in bearing the burdens of war in the form of a reduction in profits when the profits have been large in prewar times.

Among them is included the Steel Trust, of which so many praises have been sung lately. On the same page it has this to say:

> The figures as to the net income of the Steel Corporation, as shown by the company for the years 1912, 1913, 1914, 1915, 1916, and 1917, before deducting Federal income and excess-profits tax in 1917, follow:
1912	$77,075,217
1913	105,320,691
1914	46,520,407
1915	97,967,962
1916	294,026,564
1917	478,204,343
> The Federal income and excess-profit taxes of the Steel Corporation for 1917 were $233,465,435, which leaves from net income $244,738,908, of which about one-tenth was applicable to interest on bonds of the corporation and the rest available for dividends and surplus.

You will note that this institution increased its profits by 1,000 per cent in 1917 over 1914, but its exponents and defenders have much to say about the Federal income and excess-profit taxes of the Steel Corporation. True, they paid $233,465,435 to the Federal Treasury; but under the arrangement they reserved for themselves $244,738,908, which is $198,218,501 in excess of the profits for 1914. They were satisfied by increasing their net profits, after deducting taxes, only about 400 per cent over 1914.

On the same page it reports the percentage of the return on investment in 10 mills in class 3 reporting the profits in 1917. The first one is the Alan Wood Iron & Steel Co., reporting a profit of 52.63 per cent; the Nagle Steel Co., a profit is reported to be 319.67 per cent; another, the West Penn Steel Co., shows a profit of 159.01 per cent. The profits as reported range from 30.24 up to 319.67 per cent, which seems to me a large return on investments, probably much of it water.

On page 10 the commission had this to say about copper:

> COPPER.
> Very large earnings have been made in the copper industry on the whole, although it should be noted that they have been due in part to an unusually heavy demand for this metal, which is used almost exclusively for war purposes, directly and indirectly. The commission's figures show that 21 companies, including a large proportion of high-cost companies, made profits in 1917 which ranged from 1 per cent to 107 per cent on their investments.

Of zinc it had this to say:

> ZINC.
> Basing percentage on the capital stock issue of $35,000,000, the following net earnings and dividends are shown for the New Jersey Zinc Co., according to published statistics: 1916, profits, 72.5 per cent, dividends, 76 per cent; 1917, profits, 56 per cent, dividends, 46 per cent. The Federal Trade Commission's figures as to these same net earnings and dividends are available only for 1916, and indicate profits of 95.9 per cent, with dividends of 76 per cent.

On page 12 it had this to say about lumber:

> The range of profits was from a small loss to over 121 per cent on the net investment.
> The margin of profit per thousand board feet in 1917 was nearly double that in previous years, the figure being $4.83, as compared with $2.11 in 1916. A fair margin per thousand feet in the past has been recognized as being $3.

On pages 12 and 13 it makes the following report on coal:

COAL.

Generally speaking, the bituminous coal operators in 1917 had very much larger margins than in previous years. While in 1916 the margins (what operators actually received for coal sold over f. o. b. mine cost) may be regarded in some cases as lower than normal, yet the margins of 1917 were often two or three times the normal return. In the figures for 1916 and 1917 mentioned below return on investment must be covered in margins shown. The increase of margins is illustrated by an examination of the returns for 1916 and 1917 of 23 typical bituminous coal companies in the central Pennsylvania field. The average margin of these companies in 1916 was 20 cents per ton, and in 1917 was 90 cents. The highest margin for any company of the 23 in 1917 was $1.85. The corresponding margin for this company in 1916 was 41 cents. Similarly the lowest margin for any of these companies in 1917 was 27 cents, the corresponding margin for the same company in 1916 being 13 cents.

Maximum coal prices f. o. b. mines were authoritatively fixed August 21 to 23, 1917, by Executive order, and subsequently modified by the Fuel Administration. Contracts made before that time were not invalidated. In some fields as high as 90 per cent of possible production was sold under contract prices. While some contracts were below legal maximum price, probably much the greater part of the coal sold under contract went at prices substantially in excess of legal maximum prices fixed for current sales.

On page 13 it makes a report on petroleum and its products. The rates of profit are reported ranging from losses up to 122 per cent profit, which, I take it, is due to the prices for which gasoline is sold. Just think of it, poor Standard Oil struggling along at 122 per cent profit.

On page 14 it reports the meat packers. The excess profits of four of the big meat packers—Armour, Swift, Morris, and Cudahy—in the three war years, 1915 to 1917, their total profits have reached the astounding figure of $140,000,000, of which $121,000,000 represents excess over their prewar profits. The report goes on to say that the great increase in profits are not due solely to increased volume of business. Their sales increased 150 per cent; hence much of the increase is due to the higher prices rather than to volume by weight. The return of profit increase 400 per cent, or two and a half times as much as the sales. Morris & Co. are reported to have made 263.07 per cent on the three million capital outstanding. It will be remembered that it was announced that the packers' profits were fixed not to exceed 9 or 15 per cent. It would seem that a 263.07 per cent rate of profit under such license would require some explanation. To the average man it would seem that the packers got the better end of the bargain.

On page 15 the commission reports on leather and leather goods that during the year 1917 a large proportion of the tanners in the United States made unusual profits; that a number of the larger companies made net profits in 1916 in several instances two, three, four, and even five times as large as in 1915, and the 1915 net profits in turn showed increase of from 30 per cent to more than 100 per cent over those in 1914. It calls the attention to one striking instance where one company whose net profits were reported to have increased 600 per cent, or from $644.390.90 in 1914 to $3,576,544.27 in 1916. As generally known, tanneries are owned and operated by the packers. The commission calls attention to a letter of January 17, 1917, by the Eastern Leather Co., an Armour selling subsidiary, to Mr. F. W. Croll, of Armour & Co., in which it was stated that a check for $915,787, same being a dividend of 53 per cent on the 17,279 shares of common stock standing in the name of Mr. J. Ogden Armour, was inclosed and that in addition to this, $250,000 had been set aside as surplus, which represented 10 per cent of the common stock.

On page 16 the commission has this to say:

The way in which Swift & Co. proceeds when a Government limitation of profits is expected is shown by the following letter, in which Louis F. Swift writes to his brother, Ed. F. Swift, stating that he has learned that the Government expects to establish profit control in the leather industry and suggesting the advisability of reappraising their properties in certain companies. Edward F. replies:

"I approve, if done quietly and promptly.

"E. F. S."

The letter with marginal directions is as follows:

GOVERNMENT CONTROL—LEATHER COMPANIES.

CHICAGO, November 26, 1918.

Mr. EDWARD F. SWIFT, Second floor:

We have had a virtual statement from Mr. Cotton that the Government expects to establish profit control in the leather industry. With this notice I think we should at least consider the advisability of reappraising the properties of the following companies: A. C. Lawrence Leather Co., National Calfskin Co., Winchester Tannery Co., St. Paul Tannery Co., Ashland Leather Co., St. Joseph Tanning Co. (in which we have only 50 per cent ownership).

If it is agreeable to you, will arrange with Mr. Moon to go into the matter and submit figures. Awaiting your reply,

LOUIS F. SWIFT.

On page 5 the commission has this to say:

Five meat packers, Armour, Swift, Morris, Wilson, and Cudahy, and their subsidiary and affiliated companies, have monopolistic control of the meat industry and are reaching for like domination in other products. Their manipulations of the market embrace every device that is useful to them without regard to law.

Gentlemen, it would seem that the praises sung and the tears shed for the meat packers were uncalled for and confidence was misplaced. Here is the commission's final conclusion; it has this to say:

However delicate a definition is framed for profiteering, these packers have preyed upon the people unconscionably.

We are now given the assurance by the commission that the packers are soon to come under further Government regulations approved by Executive order. They were placed under further regulations a year ago, and according to the commission's report they increased their profit tenfold over 1914, and that under a limitation of from 9 to 15 per cent profit. We have been told about further regulation, legislation, and prosecution affecting the packers for the last quarter of a century. The report clearly indicates results, and further comment is unnecessary.

On page 17 the commission pays its respects to the millers by stating that the millers were contented by increasing their profits 400 per cent. It calls attention to the methods employed by various companies by padding its costs, by heavily increasing all its officers' salaries, and by manipulating the inventory, payment of extraordinary salaries, and, in some instances, bonuses to executives of corporations. An illustrative example of high remuneration charged to the expense account is that given by the American Metal Co. (Ltd.), of New York, the chief dealings of which are in zinc. One Mr. B. Hochschild, chairman of the board of directors, received a salary of $179,663.33; another, C. M. Loeb, president, received a salary of $364,326.73. Gentlemen, think of poor Loeb, struggling along in this cold world as best he can with that meager salary of $364,000, not quite a thousand dollars a day including Sundays! What a hardship it would be to him to impose the heavy burden of 50 cents on his barrel of flour, or to tax poor Loeb with a twelfth of a cent every time he goes to the baker to buy his loaf of bread. Yes, poor Loeb! If this amendment is agreed to, his net income in all probability would be reduced 50 cents, and if his salary is his only source of income, poor Loeb will have to get along with the meager sum of $364,326.23. Gentlemen, the proposed increase of 20 cents a bushel on wheat may increase the average cost per capita of flour 50 cents or a dollar, according to the amount of substitutes used, but considering the profits extorted all along the line, the increased cost of production of wheat, the increased wages—considering everything, can we afford to take the chances on its defeat in refusing to offer a compromise to the Senate? In my opinion it should not be done.

I believe the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan should be adopted. [Applause.]

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. GRIFFIN].

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I know that the Representatives from the Empire State are not supposed to take a great deal of interest in agricultural problems, but there is involved in this proposition something more than the question as to what should be the price of wheat. We ought not to haggle here over whether it shall be sold for $2.40 or $2.50 or $2.65 a bushel. I believe that this entire proposal in all its ramifications is fundamentally wrong and economically unsound.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GRIFFIN. I will, but my time is limited.

Mr. MADDEN. Two-dollar-and-a-half wheat means $2.65 because the $2.50 as fixed by the Senate means the local market with the freight added.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I presume so; but, as I said, we are not here to haggle over the price of wheat.

Mr. MADDEN. I think that we ought not to have any price fixed.

Mr. GRIFFIN. That is what I say, that trying to fix it at all is wrong in principle. What is the difference between fixing the price of wheat and fixing the price of silver?

LIKE THE FREE-SILVER AGITATION.

The wheat speculators to-day, by means of this Senate amendment, are trying to do with wheat what the silver-mine owners vainly strove to do with silver a quarter of a century ago. Our experience in the past has taught us, or ought to have taught us, the futility of legislative favoritism in price fixing. The silverites wanted to have an arbitrary price fixed for silver to guarantee them against loss due to the fluctuations of the market. That is precisely the attitude of the wheat advocates to-day. The only difference is that the wheat speculators are frank enough, and I might say quite obviously wise enough, to perceive and admit that the price of wheat will fluctuate. The silverites clung to the delusion that when once the Government put its stamp of value on a thing, whether metal or other commodity, it would forever after defy all the laws of nature. The wheat speculators are more practical. They know that prices will go down just as surely as they went up. The price-fixing idea with them therefore is not a mania, but simply a sordid pursuit of business advantage.

WHEAT GROWER NO BETTER OFF UNDER PRICE FIXING THAN BEFORE.

The wheat grower no doubt honestly believes that he is going to share in the booty, provided this Senate amendment is adopted; but I venture to predict that he will be no better off with two-fifty wheat than he is now with two-twenty wheat. The supporters of this bill admit that the wheat grower is no better off to-day with two-twenty wheat than he was when it sold for a dollar a bushel. Then why, gentlemen, do you expect any improvement from a further advancement of the price? Is the past no guide to the future? Do you not see that the same inexorable laws of the market which robbed you of the advantage of two-twenty wheat will similarly strip you of the profits from two-fifty wheat? Gentlemen, you can not defy the laws of nature, and one of the greatest of these is human selfishness.

FOOD-CONTROL LEGISLATION.

Let us take a retrospect of this food-control legislation. At the breaking out of the great world war in 1914 the food products of the United States received instantaneous impetus. The cutting off of the usual means of transportation from accustomed sources of supply abroad and diminished crops at home compelled the belligerents to look to us to supply their necessities. The drain made upon our food supplies diminished our stores to the danger point. The necessities of the belligerents, who often bid against each other for our products, coupled with the greed of speculators and middle men, raised the prices of foods beyond all reason.

We were not at war, and yet we had to bear its necessities and were threatened, in a state of profound peace, with all the anxieties of approaching famine. When we finally entered the war, conditions, of course, grew worse. Wages, which are usually the last in order to respond to sudden economic changes, proved insufficient to meet the requirements of the new order, and great hardship prevailed throughout the land. The workingman saw his loaf of bread suddenly double in price and at the same time diminish to half its former size. It is true that meat and other foods went up in proportion, but as bread is justly deemed the staff of life, it was natural that in the clamor for relief wheat should present a shining mark at which Government interference should first be directed.

Although $1 wheat was once looked on as the sign and token of the millenium, it was found to be selling in some markets as high as $3.07 per bushel. And, as the current year's crop was small, the situation seemed destined to grow more acute. There was a widespread feeling of resentment throughout the country. Congress was importuned and promptly passed the act of August 10, 1917, which was entitled "An act to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel."

Section 14 of that act contains whatever justification there is in the law for touching the problem of wheat. It is claimed by some that it gives no authority to the President or the Food Control Commission to fix the price of wheat. They claim that the intent of the law, as its title implies, was only to encourage the production of wheat and, by guaranteeing the farmer a minimum price for his product, induce him to plant larger crops. This part of the act is very ingeniously drawn and is worth some study. First, it provides:

SEC. 14. That whenever the President shall find that an emergency exists requiring stimulation of the production of wheat and that it is essential that the producers of wheat produced within he United States shall have the benefits of the guaranty provided for in this section, he is authorized, from time to time, seasonably, and as far in advance of seeding time as practicable, to determine and fix and to give public notice of what, under specified conditions, is a reasonable guaranteed price for wheat, in order to assure such producers a reasonable profit.

Next it provides—

* * * the Government of the United States hereby guarantees every producer of wheat produced within the United States that, upon compliance by him with regulations prescribed, he shall receive for any wheat produced in reliance upon this guaranty within the period, not exceeding 18 months, prescribed in the notice, a price not less than the guaranteed price therefor as fixed pursuant to this section.

Then follows a proviso that the guaranteed price to be fixed by the President shall not be less than $2 per bushel for the crop of 1917. As the guaranty is extended to May 1, 1919, it necessarily fixed also the minimum price of the crop of 1918. Let us analyze these provisions:

THE PRESIDENT CONTROLS THE SITUATION.

When the President was given the right to "determine and fix and to give public notice of a price not less than the guaranteed price therefor, as fixed pursuant to this section," and when Congress said that the price should not be less than $2, is it not self-evident, whatever might have been the expressed intent or unexpressed hope of those who contributed by their vote to the passage of this legislation, that the President can name any price he may feel disposed to, or may be advised, above the minimum?

THE INTENT OF THE LAW.

That is not only the clear intent of the statute, but it crystallizes into law the almost universal desire and aim of the great body of consumers not engaged in wheat growing. I am quite willing to believe that the wheat growers supported this legislation at its inception in the fond belief that all Congress was doing was to present them with a policy of insurance against the return of peace and a general drop in the prices of all commodities; that in the event of a drop in the wheat market the Government would pay, or see that they were paid, at least $2 per bushel for their wheat, and that in the meantime, until the cessation of the war, they could charge for their wheat anything they could get and mulct the public to their heart's content. A belief in the reasonableness of such a one-sided compact exhibits a strange vagary of the human understanding. Is it fair to have one special industry protected against loss by a Government guaranty and at the same time have a free hand to gouge the public as it pleases?

WHAT ENSUED UPON PASSAGE OF THE ACT.

Let us see what has taken place under this act? The Food Control Commission, after an exhaustive study of the food situation, made certain recommendations to the President, and he, on February 21, 1918, by proclamation, fixed $2.20 per bushel as "a reasonable guaranteed price for wheat, in order to assure 'the wheat' producers a reasonable profit." This means that if the war were to cease to-morrow and the price of wheat should drop back to a dollar a bushel, what was once its "high-water mark," the Government of the United States—in other words, the people of the United States—stand ready to make good to the wheat growers $1.20 per bushel for every bushel raised. This will appear to the average citizen of the United States, who has no kind of guaranty for the product of his hand or brain, as a stupendously liberal benefaction.

COMPLAINT OF THE WHEAT GROWERS.

But the wheat growers say they reap no benefit from this benevolence; that the price of farm implements and labor and other products, which are necessary and related to farming, have gone up so high that wheat farming has ceased to be profitable. Of course, other things have gone up. Did the wheat speculators expect that other industries would stand still and watch the steady climb of wheat without clamoring for their share of the booty? They point to the huge profits made in steel, copper, meat, and other war essentials. In reply, Uncle Sam need only repeat the scriptural question, "Is thine eye evil because I am good?" There are obviously gross evils resulting from the unpatriotic orgy of profiteering in which many special interests are plunging.

WHOLE COUNTRY SUFFERS AS WELL.

But are the wheat growers the only ones who suffer? Is not the whole country almost in despair under the tyranny of the profiteers? Surely we can not help matters by adding one more to the list of our numerous trade and industrial tyrants. To raise the liberal guaranty given to the wheat growers is price fixing in its worst form.

FOOD-CONTROL ADMINISTRATION CAN GRANT RELIEF.

If they are justly aggrieved, doubtless the Food-Control Administration will recommend to the President an increase in the guaranteed wheat price. He has the power, full and absolute. Congress has done all that it need to do. To do more and, by special legislation, raise the minimum price to $2.50 per bushel would practically be shearing him of all power under the food-control act. Rather than that, we had better repeal it at once.

FOOD-CONTROL ACT NOT A PRICE-FIXING LAW.

This law, which the wheat growers are striving to turn from its purpose, is not a price-fixing law, but a law to control prices and restrain profiteering. If it has not worked out satisfactorily in the wheat industry because of the free leg given to other industries to indulge in profiteering, the remedy is not to increase the wheat-growers' guaranty, but to enlarge the scope of the act and enact other laws setting a limit to prices in every industry.

THE PRESIDENT'S VIEWS.

The President clearly intimated this as the proper course to pursue, in his address of December 4, 1917. He said:

Recent experience has convinced me that the Congress must go further in authorizing the Government to set limits to prices. The law of supply and demand, I am sorry to say, has been replaced by the law of unrestrained selfishness. While we have eliminated profiteering in several branches of industry, it still runs impudently rampant in others.

The farmers, for example, complain, with a great deal of justice, that while the regulation of food prices restricts their incomes, no restraints are placed upon the prices of most of the things they must themselves purchase; and similar inequities obtain on all sides.

LET ALL HELP TO FORMULATE SOUND LEGISLATION.

If the wheat speculators are in earnest, let them get behind the President and formulate sound legislation that will embody his expressed wish. There are very serious doubts in the minds of many as to whether the wheat advocates really want the prices of other products regulated in the same way as they have been able to get this Congress to do in their favor. Their idea of wheat regulation is a minimum price per bushel below which wheat will not be permitted to fall. This is vastly different from the fond hopes and expectations of the great bulk of our people.

THE CONSUMER'S IDEA OF PRICE REGULATION.

The consumer's idea of price regulation was a purely defensive one against greed and avarice. He hoped for a maximum price on the bushel of wheat and on the other necessaries of life, beyond which they dare not rise. The wheat grower asks for a price per bushel below which it must not fall. Then, in addition, in the event that the markets of the world and the laws of nature diminish his arbitrary set estimate of his particular product, he wants, if you please, the whole country to chip in and bear the loss.

WOULD IT BE FAIR TO APPLY THE PLAN OF GUARANTIES TO OTHER INDUSTRIES?

I would like to ask: Would the wheat grower honestly be willing to have the principle involved in the food-control act applied to the other industries from the high prices of whose products he claims to suffer? Would he be willing to have a minimum price put on steel, copper, clothing, and farming implements below which they will not be permitted to fall, and have the Government guarantee those industries, on the cessation of the war, the difference between the minimum price so fixed and the price which they may reasonably be expected to bring in the open market? Before answering, let Mr. Wheat Grower please think of the staggering dimensions of the annual budget, following the conclusion of this war, which such a policy would entail to make good the threatened losses in all the war industries. It does not require the prophetic eye of the seer to foresee the stupendous national burdens we would have to face if we were foolish enough to indulge in any more such legislation.

A GUARANTEED MINIMUM PRICE UNSOUND ECONOMICALLY.

To grant a guaranteed minimum price to any one, or even to all war industries alike, is unsound economically and wholly unwise from a material standpoint. If guarantees, however, are to be considered, because of the precedent we have established with the wheat industry, the plan adopted, in the control of railroads, of basing the guaranteed compensation on the profits of three preceding years, although not desirable, is yet more reasonable and more fair to future generations. When the guaranteed price of $2 was fixed in the food-control act last year it was based on an inflated value due to three years' exploitation. Would you give guarantees to the other war industries based on the same factors or would you go back to normal times for your price basis? But I can not insist too emphatically that the policy of guaranteeing profits to any industry in any form is unpatriotic and unwise.

BETTER TO GRANT SUBSIDIES OUTRIGHT.

In practical results it is a subsidy, no matter how you disguise it. I am not in favor of subsidies, but if Government help is necessary to encourage essential war industries let us be bold and fearless and help them outright by definite, distinct, and specific annual allowances instead of adopting this wild and ill-considered subterfuge of guarantees, which will leave our national obligations tremendous and uncertain for a score of years after the war.

SELFISHNESS THE BASIS OF WAR PRICES.

The pull of selfishness is as certain and calculable in the actions of men as the law of gravitation among the forces of nature. The tendency of prices to rise upon the slightest provocation may almost be said to be an economic law. War is generally deemed one of the provocations, adequate and sufficiently exculpatory to the common mind, to justify a raid upon the pockets of mankind. Instead of being justifiable it is, on the contrary, one of the meanest manifestations of poor, weak human nature. Instead of being coddled and humored it ought to be scotched the moment it rears its despicable head. Once allow one industry to reap the reward of greed and the others will follow at the heels of the favored one, their clamors only to be appeased by granting to all alike the liberty to rob their fellow man. When this delectable state is reached and they "level up" to ascertain their attitude, they find, as the wheat interests have found, that they are relatively on no higher financial level than they were before.

Sometimes, Mr. Speaker, a homely illustration will suffice to exemplify a problem in economics. On the evening of the Fourth of July last on the Plaza of the Capitol we saw an illustration of greed in a certain form which allowed the futility of man's struggle to obtain an advantage over his fellow man. When the parade began a few people rose up and stood on their feet. When they stood up in their greed to view the pageant those behind them, having their vision shut off, also stood up. After a little while everyone was on his feet in that vast assembly. When those who had first stood found that the temporary rise in their position did not give the advantage they sought they got on chairs. In a few moments everyone was on chairs, trying in vain to get an advantage over his neighbor in witnessing the spectacle.

So it is with the fixing of the prices of products of industry. The wheat price is standing on a chair, and every product will stand on chairs. As witnessed by this amendment from the Senate, the wheat industry is attempting to stand upon a step-ladder, and some of the gentlemen of this House would give them a balloon to raise them higher.

In the struggle of the profiteer for advantage those who first got in the game doubtless have made fortunes before the others caught up with them. Truly in their case it is the "devil that takes the hindmost," but it should really be "devil take the foremost."

FEW EVENTUALLY PROFIT FROM SELFISHNESS.

We should not shut our eyes to economic truths so plainly discernible. Where all share alike in a general rise in prices, none will be relatively better off than another among the violators of law and decency; but those who are on the bottom layer—the vast body of consumers—will ultimately suffer most.

A GENERAL RISE IN PRICES MEANS A FALL IN THE VALUE OF MONEY.

Nor will those who lift themselves by greed to the higher levels share an unmixed blessing, for a general rise in the prices of commodities means a fall in the value of money; in other words, lessening the purchasing power of the dollar. High prices mean cheap money, and already the American dollar, which for years has held a proud place in the exchanges of the world, is being quoted at a discount.

CHEAP MONEY A MENACE TO THE STATE.

It is an egregious error to imagine that a fall in the value of money is a hardship only to the individual. It is a distinct menace to the State. In this crisis in our history it is doubling the difficulties of our Government in financing the war. Think of what our twenty billion war loans would buy in supplies and munitions of war with the dollar at its normal value. We are simply throwing our money lavishly away. The proposed amendments will only make our situation worse. The initial mistake was made when we first countenanced greed in any form. Our present juggling with this question is the profoundest folly. Instead of going further we should retreat, and we should retreat now before we are involved in endless complications. When the annals of this war period are written, the future historian will say that in the years of 1917 and 1918 the people of the United States, through the Sixty-fifth Congress, made the vain attempt to lift themselves financially by pulling up on their boot straps.

THE REMEDY.

What is the remedy? I would say repression instead of inflation. Not a guaranteed minimum to any industry, but Uncle Sam, with a stout whip in hand, lashing the profiteers back into good manners and sound patriotism. Not a policy of coddling with soft terms, as "reasonable allowances for war conditions," but simply the solemn pronouncement of the ipse dixit "no special war prices for this war," neither in bread, nor raiment, nor fuel, nor metals, nor supplies of war. No, by all that is sacred, not so long as our boys, fighting at the front, are not asking special war prices for their loyal hearts, their rugged limbs, their devoted bodies, and their eternal souls.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I am not going to discuss the propriety of fixing the price of cotton or wheat or any other agricultural product. The price was fixed at $2.20, as I understand it. The proposition ranges all the way from $2.65 down to $2.20. At the primary markets, as I understand it, it is believed that $2.40 could be arranged for and an agreement obtained by the conferees upon that basis.

Farm labor is scarce, prices all along the line have soared. To put it in another way, the value of money has decreased one-half, and the dollar that you had three years ago has a purchasing power now of only 50 cents. We fixed the price, right or wrong, and the farmers have at great expense and shortage of labor relied at least upon the proclamation of the President, at $2.20. As far as I am concerned, if I can get a chance I am going to vote for $2.40. Well, you say, we will fix the price in the future of wheat, cotton, hogs, horses, oats, rye, barley. No; I will not fix any more prices. But we have got to keep the contract which we made when we fixed the price to the farmer and when at great expense he has put in a good round crop. [Applause.]

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD].

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, no more outrageous proposition for a long time has been presented to the House of Representatives than this to increase the price of this year's crop of wheat. After the crops have been planted and the price of wheat has been fixed at $2.20 for this year's crops under an Executive order, after an agreement was had between the representatives of farmers and the Government, to juggle with the price and say "We will give you an increased price at the expense of the consuming public of the country from 20 to 45 cents more than we agreed to," is a policy that can not be too severely condemned. No one can disguise the fact that the price was fixed at $2.20 for this year's crop after a full survey of all the conditions. The farmers went ahead with that idea a year ago and they planted their crops. You can not advance any argument that it is necessary to get a greater yield because the yield of wheat is surpassing. That proves that the price that was agreed upon was adequate to get the desired crop.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. And now what do you propose to do after a tentative contract has been entered into with the growers of wheat? You intend to make them a gift of 20 cents or 45 cents a bushel or whatever this Congress will yield in deference to the vote of the farmer. We hear much about the farmer, and yet the farmer raises most of the products he consumes, while the laboring man, the artisan in the cities, is suffering by reason of the high price that the farmers are getting.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I can not yield in three minutes. I venture this prediction: That there is no class of people in America who have been benefited more as a result of this war than have the farmers. There is no question about that, and they are not complaining. Of course, there are persons who will rise in both Houses of Congress and advocate a higher price to be paid to them as a special favor, but how can you justify an increase in the price after it was fixed at $2.20?

I am not in favor of legislative price fixation. There may be need of price fixation by administrative bodies, but for Congress, without any statistics, without any reliable information, to go wild and haphazardly fix the price seems to me is the meanest character of legislative graft. Instead of taking the money directly out of the Treasury and paying it piecemeal to the farmer, you say: "We will do it by raising your price arbitrarily and have the consuming public, the artisans of the country, pay what we vote." How can you justify any such outrageous policy as that? We have entered into a contract. It would not be right to reduce the price from $2.20 to $2.10, and no more is it right for us to increase the price from $2.20 to $2.40 or $2.65. Let us stick by our agreement and not seek the vote of the farmer in this crisis by any such despicable means.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, I will ask the gentleman from Iowa to use some of his time. We shall have only one or two more speeches on this side.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COX].

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I get all-fired tired when I hear men rise on the floor of the House and talk about the present unprecedented prosperity of the farmer. I wonder why such Members do not resign their seats in Congress if farmers are becoming millionaires and go out and don a suit of overalls and brogan shoes and go to raising wheat, corn, rye, barley, hogs, cattle, and all other farm commodities that farmers grow in this country. I wonder why if farming is so remunerative the city gent does not lay aside his diamonds and gold-headed cane and go to the country and get rich, as a few Members of the House would lead us to believe that farmers are getting rich. Members who make such arguments as these fail to realize that the farmer drives six days out of every week and each week in the year from daylight to dark, and usually each member of his family drives the same. The farmers are not paupers. They probably are reasonably prosperous now, but nothing has been given to them to make them prosperous. They have done it in spite of conditions and with their two strong arms.

A few days ago the Trade Commission reported to the Senate the names of a large number of men and corporations in the country who during the last year made millionaires of themselves, and made it out of abnormal war profits. I scanned the report from top to bottom and there was not a single farmer in it, not one. Last spring the farmers were solemnly promised and given positive assurance that the price of farming implements and fertilizers would be fixed, two essential necessities for the farmer to enable him to raise his crops, and yet prices of these things are not fixed, and they are soaring to the skies day in and day out. I am heartily in favor of price fixing of the necessities of life. In my opinion, it is the only way to control prices and keep them within living reach. I was in favor of fixing the price on wheat and I am in favor of it to-day. I was in favor of fixing the price on sugar and I am in favor of it to-day. I was in favor of fixing the price on wool and I am in favor of it to-day. But let me say to you in all seriousness this thing of price fixing has become a one-sided affair. Prices have been fixed of many of the great staple commodities of the North, but of the great staple commodity of the South—cotton—the price has not been fixed at all.

The price of wheat fixed by Executive order is now $2.20 per bushel at the principal primary markets, giving to the producer about $2 per bushel. Since the price was fixed at $2.20 per bushel, freight rates have been increased 25 per cent, and the grower of wheat is compelled to stand this increase in freight rate. The proposition soon to be voted upon proposes to increase the price of wheat to $2.40 per bushel at the principal primary markets. This would give to the grower an increase of about 20 cents per bushel. It takes five bushels to make one barrel of flour. This would increase the cost of a barrel of flour about $1. We annually consume about 100,000,000 barrels of flour, and one barrel of flour will make 600 loaves of bread. This 20 cents per bushel increase on wheat to the grower would increase the cost a little less than one-sixth of a cent per loaf. The increase of $1 per barrel would mean an increase of about $5 per year to the average family for its flour, a mere bagatelle in the way of increasing the cost per family. Let me say to you gentlemen from the South who are here insisting upon standing by the original House proposition that you are willingly voting and gladly fixing the farmers' commodities of the North, but I do not see very many of you rushing in here and demanding that the price be fixed on cotton. [Applause.]

You gentlemen of the South are willing to stand by and fix the price of wheat of the northern farmer and do nothing at all to get the price fixed on cotton. [Applause.] You are boasting of the fourteen or fifteen millions of bales of cotton that you are raising this year in an unfixed market, the prices being from 30 to 35 cents a pound. We of the North do not raise cotton, but we have to purchase the finished commodity of raw cotton in the nature of wearing apparel, and we are interested in getting cotton goods as cheaply as possible. You are interested in cheap wheat in the South. You want cheap bread for your cotton planters. We in the North are interested in getting some corresponding benefit in getting cheap cotton goods to wear. You are willing to stand here and see the price of wool fixed. You are willing to stand here and see the price of sugar fixed, the three great staple commodities raised by the farmers of the North, and we are told by both words and actions, "Do not touch cotton." There is something sacred about cotton in the South. The cotton planter must be permitted to raise all the cotton he can, sell it at an unfixed price, and because the price of cotton is unfixed—the price of the finished commodity of cotton—even the cheaper grades of calicoes, factory and bleachings, are almost beyond the reach of the poor of both North and South.

All the farmers of the North want is a square deal, and it is the only way that Congress can afford to play this game. Play it equally fair between the North and the South. The same argument as to the necessity of fixing the price of wheat, sugar, and wool produced in the North applies with the same force as to the fixing of the price of cotton in the South. It is unfair, unjust, can not be defended upon any ground, moral or political, to fix the price of things produced in the North and refuse to fix the price of cotton raised in the South. All I ask and all the farmers of the North ask is a square deal. Down to this hour it has been a one-sided affair, and that side has been in favor of the South. My friend from Milwaukee, Mr. Stafford, said that Congress fixed the price of wheat. What a ridiculous proposition to say that Congress fixed the price of wheat. If I know anything about it, and I think I do, because I have watched it, the President, by Executive order, fixed the price of wheat. [Applause.] If we do not give the farmers some assurance that the price of wheat to them will be increased, I very much fear that we will wake up when it is too late, and find next year that they have not seeded the wheat they did this year.

It should be remembered that the wheat growers, sugar raisers, and woolgrowers are laboring to-day under almost dangerous difficulties. Shortage of farm labor everywhere in the North. It can only be supplemented by the labor of women, and yet Members talk about farmers being wealthy. If the farmer did not put in longer hours, work more days, weeks, and months in each year than the man does in the city, the cities would starve to death; their streets would grow over in grass. Let the Member of this House or the man in the city who believes for one moment that all is pleasure, happiness, and sunshine in the country, let him go out and try it, and before one day's sun sets he will have a different story to tell. I intend to vote for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. McLAUGHLIN] proposing to fix the price of wheat at $2.40 per bushel. [Applause.]

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH].

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, the distinguished gentleman from Illinois during the course of his remarks stated that he was in favor of keeping the contract we have made with the farmers of this country. He is in favor of keeping the contract, but increasing the consideration. Now, we know under the guarantee as fixed by the Executive we have had planted one of the largest crops of grain of this or any other country at the price fixed at $2.20, and because that crop has been planted and bids fair to be harvested we must, forsooth, come in and give them an additional compensation in the way of price for their wheat, and I say that it is unfair to the great American public and to the President of the United States, who acted under authority granted by Congress in fixing this price at $2.20 per bushel. Let us keep the compact which resulted, and let us see to it that the farmers keep their part of the agreement that they entered into. Oh, gentlemen talk about patriotic farmers and how they have come forth in support of their country. Of course they have, but they are not the only patriots. The people of this country are bearing the burden of the increased price for flour and for substitutes, for wearing apparel, and everything else, and it is rather significant that these great wheat-growing States should pay such a small portion of the increased taxation that has been levied upon American people. The great State of Illinois, outside of the Chicago district, of Minnesota, of Kansas, of Indiana, outside of manufacturing sections, all of those States pay a very small portion of these extra war taxes that have been levied upon the people of the country, and if these farmers are anxious to get increased price for their wheat in order that they might pay more into the Federal Treasury why do not they raise the price to $5 a bushel, or why not exempt them from taxation altogether?

Mr. DECKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. DECKER. They pay the same taxes on their incomes as the people of Massachusetts, Chicago, and New York pay, do they not?

Mr. WALSH. They may, but it is rather strange if those gentlemen are so prosperous as they have been represented here that the most prosperous farming communities of farming States like the State of Iowa, where it has a per capita wealth of $3,600, should pay an income tax and these war taxes of a little less than $18,000,000.

Mr. DECKER. Will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. DECKER. Does not that indicate that they are not making as much as some other parts of the country during this war time and that is the reason they do not pay?

Mr. WALSH. That is no reason why the Federal Congress should by legislation increase their income by increasing the price of wheat per bushel.

Mr. DECKER. Does the gentleman think he ought to reproach our farmers out West for not paying more taxes——

Mr. WALSH. Oh, I know the farmers are inspired by a desire to get just as much as anybody else can, and if they can do it by legislation they will do it.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LEVER. I ask the gentleman from Iowa to use some time. We have only two more speeches.

Mr. HAUGEN. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MORGAN].

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Speaker, I have presented an amendment to the McLaughlin amendment, which proposes to fix the price of wheat at $2.40 per bushel. My amendment fixes the price at $2.65. If my amendment should fail, I will then vote for the McLaughlin proposition, because $2.40 would be 20 cents better than $2.20, the existing price. Two dollars and sixty-five cents per bushel for wheat is not too much. If you go back to the time when the food-control bill was passed you will find that under normal conditions, under the law of supply and demand, under free, uncontrolled, and unrestricted market conditions, the price of wheat was, in round numbers, $3 per bushel. Congress passed an act giving the President the right to fix the price of wheat, subject to a minimum price of not less than $2 per bushel. When this law was approved the 1917 wheat crop had been produced. It was thrashed. It was ready for the market. Indeed, it was being marketed at $3 per bushel. The Federal Government assumed a monopoly in the wheat business. The price of wheat was reduced to $2.20 per bushel. Now, then, what did that cost the wheat growers of the United States? It cost them, in round numbers, about $400,000,000. This money was taken out of the pockets of the wheat growers in order that the nonfarming population might have cheaper flour. This reduction in the price of wheat cost the wheat growers of my district probably eight to ten million dollars.

Now, then, I have never acquiesced in that indirect tax on the wheat growers of the country. I believe that when the Government assumed a monopoly in the wheat business it should have paid the farmers the market price at the time the Government monopoly was assumed. Then the farmers could not have had any complaint. But it was an injustice to the farmers to reduce their wheat from $3 a bushel to $2.20 a bushel, indirectly taxing them $400,000,000 for the benefit of the nonfarming population, and that wrong will never be righted until Congress by some act compensates the farmers for that loss.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has expired.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the gentlemen on the other side use some time.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HELVERING].

Mr. HELVERING. Mr. Speaker, some of the propositions advanced by the advocates of the lower price for wheat are rather amusing considering the circumstances. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] says that the great crop of wheat has been raised because the Executive order has made wheat $2.20. Now, it is an absolute fact that 700,000,000 bushels of that wheat was growing and was well on the way to making the crop which he speaks of before the Executive order of $2.20 went into effect.

The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] says we should not violate a contract. What is that contract? The contract was the resolution by the Senate that we should not sell for less than $2 per bushel, and under that proposition the farmers all over this country went to work, thinking that the product which they raised would be kept on a level with the other products. And what is the spectacle which we behold? Simply this: Every time a farmer goes to town where he does his trading, to buy some useful article, he finds it has raised in price from the last time he bought it, and the next time it has raised again, while at the same time, as a result of the Executive order which placed wheat absolutely at $2.20, his product has remained on a level. In other words, I know the situation in my State is simply this, that the farmer feels he has been made a "goat" in this proposition; and you would not feel good, nor would anybody else, if they thought they had been made a "goat" in a proposition in reference to their products. The farmer will do everything he can to raise everything he can for the support of this Government, but he is just like everybody else in that he is going to raise that article which will produce him the most revenue from the same amount of work. And I say to you gentlemen in all candor, without any reference to the patriotism of the farmer—for he will be patriotic—that the product which he raises will be the product which brings him the most money in return. Therefore I say to you as my prediction that this wheat price should be made at least such as will equalize it with the price of products which the farmer must buy. I hope that at least the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. McLAUGHLIN] for $2.40 may be agreed to.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CANDLER].

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, what is the situation in reference to this whole matter? The House originally declined to fix any price upon wheat at all, but left that matter to be governed by the discretion which it placed on other powers and in other sources. The Senate fixed it by law at $2. Then it was fixed at $2.20, and the President by proclamation which he issued has fixed it at that amount. The Senate then saw proper by an amendment to fix it at $2.50, not at the terminal market, not at the place where it can be handled and where the business can be conducted along business lines and according to business methods, but fixed it at the local elevator, at the local depots, and at the local places throughout the United States of America, where, as you know, it can not be handled in that way successfully. The fact is, it would make it absolutely impossible to control it and handle it if this amendment that is in the bill at this time should be adopted. It went to the conference, and during these days and weeks it has been considered by the conferees of the House and the Senate. When the annual appropriation bill went to conference the Members of the House asked that they have an opportunity to vote upon this question before any final decision was arrived at. We assured them as conferees that that should be done. We came back from the conference with everything in the bill settled—every single, solitary item in it disposed of, with the exception of this one proposition, and submitted it to the House and gave the House an opportunity to vote upon it. The vote was taken by calling the roll, and the majority, as I recollect it, in opposition to this proposition was 68 in the House. Then under the direction of the House and under the vote of the House, as recorded, the conferees went back to the conference with the Senate again, and under that instruction your conferees, obeying what we believed by this vote to be the will and the voice of the House, stood for the proposition as announced, and said to the Senate that they should recede.

Another rule that was announced by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] a few days ago, a gentleman who has had more experience, perhaps, than anybody else in the House, was that when legislation was put upon an appropriation bill and the other legislative body objected to it, it was the duty of the body placing the legislation upon the appropriation bill to recede. This is legislation upon an appropriation bill, and therefore under the rule it was the duty for the conferees of the Senate to recede. They declined to do it, and there has been a deadlock during this time.

Now, the conferees have come back to the House, obeying your will again, and have submitted the question to your decision as to what shall be done. The proposition is to fix the price of wheat at $2.65, offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MORGAN]. The vote will come upon that proposition first, because it is offered as a substitute. If that is voted down, the next vote will come on the proposition of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MCLAUGHLIN] to concur with an amendment making it $2.40. If that is defeated, then the third and last proposition will be to concur in the Senate amendment.

Therefore the votes as they will come will, first, be in reference to $2.65; then in reference to $2.40; and if they should be defeated, then to concur in the price, $2.50. If that price is defeated, it will stand where it was before, as was announced by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. YOUNG]. If the House stands by its position, the Senate must recognize that it is up to them under the rules to recede, and they would recede, and this bill would become a law in 30 minutes after it left the House of Representatives.

Gentlemen, that is the history of the legislation. That is the issue as it is presented here to-day. You voted for it before, and voted against the $2.50 proposition. Vote the same way to-day and stand by what you did before. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I would not have said a word on this proposition if the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] and other gentlemen had not said that the farmers had entered into a contract with the Government to raise wheat at $2.20 a bushel and are guilty of a breach of contract by now asking for an increase of the price.

The farmers never did enter into any such contract. There is no such obligation on their part. I understand the essential feature of the contract rests upon the mutuality of obligation. The Government did fix the price on No. 1 wheat at $2.20 a bushel. Everybody who knows anything about the proposition knows that very little No. 1 wheat is grown. The great bulk of the wheat is No. 2 and No. 3, and it is my understanding that the farmers have not, in fact, received to exceed an average of $2 a bushel for their wheat grown in 1917.

It is well known that the cost of production has increased immensely. The cost of wheat has been increased by the cost of farm labor, the cost of seed harvesting, of thrashing, and it is unfair to say that the farmers have entered into and are bound by such a contract.

Now, the McLaughlin amendment provides that the farmers shall receive $2.40 a bushel for No. 2 wheat at the principal markets, about 25 of them, named in the Executive order to which the McLaughlin amendment refers, which would mean that the farmer would receive from $2.20 to $2.25 in the local markets for their wheat, and not $2.40, as the cost of transportation must be added, and the freights have recently been increased 25 per cent.

The fact that the farmers have raised a great crop of wheat is not solely because of the profit involved. It was because they realized the necessity to raise wheat in order that our armies might be fed and that our allies might be fed. It was not the hope of gain so much as by a patriotic desire to do their bit toward helping to win the war that impelled them to make the effort to increase the acreage of wheat. There is no more patriotic element of our American citizenship than the farmers. [Applause.]

I wish to say to the gentlemen from the cities who are wanting cheaper bread, you ought to have some regard for the man at the plow, the man that goes out at sunrise and works until dark. He does not work under any eight-hour schedule, but he puts in all the day, and he takes all the risk. To illustrate some of the risks incurred by the farmers I might mention that my tenant on one farm raised 135 acres of wheat last year and within three weeks of the harvest it was destroyed by the floods. This year my tenant raised 115 acres on the same farm, and three weeks ago it was destroyed by floods. It would be hard to estimate what it would cost to raise wheat under such adverse circumstances as that. The farmers not only have to incur the risk of floods but of drought and other adverse conditions of the seasons.

To say that the farmer should not receive consideration when he is doing his part to win the war is to do him a serious injustice. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, I ask the gentleman from Iowa to use the balance of his time.

Mr. HAUGEN. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. FAIRFIELD].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Mr. Speaker, no doubt a great wrong has been done to the northern farmer, whether intentionally or not. Whenever it turns out that two staple crops are seized upon, the market determined, and there is no relief except in the fixed, arbitrary decision of Government we have discrimination in legislation. I say to you that we can not afford in this Congress thus to discriminate against a great body of American citizenship.

It may be they will claim on the other side that an international agreement has been entered into. If so, why, when the farmer's product has been determined as to price, are not the various manufactured products also determined? The manufacturers of the East demanded an increased price for their products, and in many instances demanded that the Government should furnish the capital. Men say that in all the local markets wheat was selling at from $2.75 to $3 a bushel when the price was fixed. This has not been denied. We said here that it must not sink below $2, but we did not intend that that should be the maximum. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HAUGEN. I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MCLAUGHLIN].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MCLAUGHLIN] is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. MCLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, this amendment would fix the minimum price of wheat at $2.40, based on grade No. 2, not at every local railroad station or local elevator, as the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CANDLER] says, but at least at 25 of the principal interior primary markets of the country. The names of the 25 places have been given by the President in a proclamation of the 21st of February, 1918, relating to another matter, and I wish to have the same places "and such other places as the President may designate" named or fixed for this purpose.

As to this international agreement of which the gentleman from South Carolina has spoken, by which the President has pledged that he will assist the Canadian Government in taking care of a large crop of wheat, if it shall fortunately be large, if the high price fixed be above the market price. With all respect to the gentleman from South Carolina—and I do not for a moment question his veracity—I doubt if that arrangement was ever made. If it was, it has already been violated, because the President has modified or has signified his intention to modify his order fixing the price at $2.20 to the extent of allowing an increase in the price to correspond with or allow for the increase in freight rates. If it can be violated in one respect, it can be violated in another, and is, therefore, of no force or effect whatever.

It is said that the farmers who are demanding or will have the advantage of this increase of price of wheat are lacking in patriotism. The farmers of this country, knowing that wheat was the least profitable of all grain crops they could raise this year planted and will reap hundreds of thousands of acres; yes, the acreage will reach millions, more than would have been planted if they had been selfish or avaricious, because they knew, as I say, that it was not as profitable a crop as they might raise. Compare their attitude with that of business men in sections of the country from which opposition to this amendment comes. You will find manufacturers in those sections are not engaging in business unprofitably. They are always and insistently demanding that capital be furnished to enable them to do business, demanding that it be furnished them from the Federal Treasury, and that they be guaranteed handsome profits. [Applause.] Compare their patriotism with the patriotism of the farmers. The request embodied in my amendment for increase of the price to $2.40 is a reasonable request. The price of $2.20, now prevailing as the result of Executive order, was never agreed to by the farmers, as has been stated from the floor. [Applause.] It was a matter of compulsion as far as farmers were concerned. A board was appointed to fix the price, and I shall speak of that later if I have time.

Section 14 of the act of August 10, 1917—the food-control act—contains a provision in regard to the guaranteed price of the wheat crop of 1918. It provides that the guaranteed price shall not be less than $2 per bushel, but leaves to the President the matter of fixing a higher price. In order to determine the price the President appointed a board composed of farmers, business men, and representatives of labor, but the farmers were a small minority of the board. As I remember the proceedings of that board—and I am sure my recollection is right—the farmers at that time strongly urged that a price of not less than $2.50 per bushel be fixed, while the price urged by a majority of the other members of the board ranged from $1.85 to $2 per bushel. The final result determined by a majority of the committee, not one of which majority was a farmer or interested in any way in farming, was the fixing of $2.20 per bushel at Chicago. This was an arbitrary action and contrary to the law, because it provides that the price, whatever it might be, shall be paid at the principal interior primary markets—not one market—but at the 25 places which have been designated and are well known as the principal markets of the country.

It has been frequently said here in debate that farmers are inconsistent and blameworthy for asking or being willing to accept a price for wheat above $2.20 per bushel, it being charged that their own committee had fixed that price. This charge is unfounded, because, as I have stated, the price was fixed at $2.20 over the strenuous protest of farmer representatives of the committee.

It has also been frequently said here that any increase of the price of wheat will result in a corresponding increase of the price of flour. This is not true. There need be no increase whatever of the price of flour if the Food Administration will deal with the millers as it has with the farmers. The report of the Federal Trade Commission, made after thorough investigation, shows that the Food Administrator has fixed the profits the millers shall have on each barrel of flour, and the result is, and has been ever since that action by the Food Administrator, that the millers' profit is at least $1.08 per barrel higher than it was before the war. It takes from 4½ to 4$\frac{7}{10}$ bushels of wheat to make a barrel of flour, and it is therefore seen that the miller is, by virtue of the Food Administrator's order, receiving an additional profit of nearly 25 cents per bushel on every bushel of wheat that is made into flour. There is no reason whatever—in fact, it is rank injustice—to permit this large additional profit to the miller while at the same time insisting that the farmer shall have no increase of price for his wheat. There is no reason why the millers, who made large and satisfactory profits before the war, should have their profits increased now, especially as the increased profit is at the expense of the farmer.

I should be pleased if the House were willing to agree to the Senate amendment just as it stands, but after conferring with a large number of Members am satisfied that it is necessary for me to offer a compromise. This compromise consists in reducing the guaranteed price from $2.50 as carried by the Senate amendment to $2.40 per bushel, and making that price payable to growers of wheat at the 25 market places named by the President in his proclamation of February 21, 1918, "and at such other places as he may designate," this last provision as to the markets being in lieu of the Senate provision that the price shall be paid at each and every local railroad station and each and every local elevator in the country. I have found that the latter provision, that is, that the price shall be paid at railroad stations and elevators, is particularly objectionable to Members of the House, and that, if we were to insist on the Senate amendment respecting the places of payment, we would be inviting defeat of the entire proposition. It is reasonable to demand that the guaranteed price of wheat shall be paid at the 25 principal markets, and it would be reasonable also that the guaranteed price be paid at every market at which the Federal Government employs and keeps a licensed inspector of grain; but it is evident that as far as we can safely go or with hope of success at this time is to limit the places at which the price shall be paid to the markets that have been heretofore or shall hereafter be designated by the President.

It has been well said in this debate, as has often been said on this floor, that farmers are dissatisfied. And as I have said before, there is reason for this dissatisfaction. At the time the President, acting on the recommendation of the price-fixing committee, fixed the price of wheat at $2.20 per bushel, the prevailing market price was nearly, if not quite, $1 per bushel more than the price fixed, and there was reason to believe that, if no price had been fixed, if the law of supply and demand had been permitted to determine the price of wheat the price would have gone even higher than it was at that time. So the price of $2.20 per bushel, which by action of the Food Administration became the maximum as well as the minimum price, was naturally very unsatisfactory to producers of wheat. When the Congress, by act of August 10, 1917, determined that there should be a minimum guaranteed price of wheat of not less than $2 per bushel no one thought that the price to be fixed would be the maximum price also. Everyone knew that the prevailing price was then about $3 per bushel, and that the tendency was upward, but rules and regulations of the Food Administrator, under the authority given him by the act to prevent speculation in wheat, to license millers, elevator operators, and wheat buyers, made it impossible for any buyer of wheat to pay more than $2.20 per bushel. Instances are known of millers having their licenses taken from them for paying more than $2.20. This arbitrary action of the Food Administrator deprived farmers of the benefit of the market price of wheat and of opportunity to take advantage of natural increase of prices, which everyone believed would have come.

Another practice of the Food Administrator was detrimental to the interests of farmers. Almost every producer of wheat is also a dairyman, and must buy bran and other feeds. One of the rules was made for the ostensible purpose of keeping down the price of bran, but the desired result was not reached. The result was that millers did not sell bran, at least did not sell it to the farmers or to their regular trade. They placed the bran in the hands of dealers, disposing of it as far as any one was able to learn in keeping with the rule of the Food Administration as to price; but the dealers made their own sales and fixed their own prices, which were uniformly very high. Or instead of millers disposing of their bran to dealers they mixed in some chaff or a small quantity of other by-products of the mill and called it "dairy feed," and sold it at prices two or three times as high as the prescribed price of bran. There is no evidence that the Food Administrator has made any effort to prevent evasion of his rule, and it is not strange that buyers of bran are dissatisfied.

Farmers are dissatisfied also because, while prices of wheat and other farm products have been regulated, there has been no effort whatever to reduce or regulate in any manner the prices farmers must pay for machinery, equipment, or supplies they must have to enable them to carry on their business. The result has been that the price of wheat has been kept down to a point where it is much less profitable to raise that grain than it is to raise any of the other grain crops, and prices of machinery, equipment, and supplies have increased and been permitted to be increased from 50 per cent to 200 per cent over normal times.

My amendment was not offered with the idea that it is necessary to insure large profits to farmers in order to induce them to be patriotic, but as a matter of common justice and as a business proposition from the standpoint of the Government. The Government is demanding and will continue to demand the largest possible production of wheat. The farmers are patriotic and will sow wheat next year as they sowed it this year, instead of devoting their fields to more profitable grain crops. But is it just or reasonable to demand that they shall do so? The adoption of this amendment will be evidence of the fact that the Government is interested in and willing to do justice to the farmers of the country. I trust it will be adopted. The Senate is waiting for the House to act, and there is no doubt but that it will accept this compromise and the appropriation bill will promptly become law.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LEVER. Gentlemen of the House, in the first place I want to call your attention to the fact that section 14 of the food-control act was adopted for the purpose of stimulating production last year. [Applause.] The language of the act as it left the House was very greatly modified in the Senate, and the language of the present act is practically the language of the Senate. I want to draw your special attention to the fact that the Senate thought that a guaranteed price of $2 per bushel was sufficient to stimulate the production of enough wheat in this country to supply the needs of our own people and of our allies. The President of the United States, however, acting under the authority granted in this act, of his own volition, differing with Congress in his judgment as to that, guaranteed a price of $2.20 per bushel at the terminal markets on the basis of Chicago. Gentlemen have complained here to-day that somebody, intentionally or unintentionally, is working a great hardship upon the farmers of certain sections of this country. I want these gentlemen to bear in mind the fact that, if my memory serves me correctly, when the conference report on the food-control bill came back to this House there was not a single solitary vote recorded against the adoption of the conference report with this Senate amendment in it making this guaranty $2 a bushel. And that, gentlemen of the House, was in the early days of last August.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEVER. I yield for a question.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. That was a minimum price, was it not, and never was intended to fix the maximum price?

Mr. LEVER. That was the guaranteed price to the farmer.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. That it should be not less than that?

Mr. LEVER. That it should be not less than $2 a bushel. The President said it should not be less than $2.20 a bushel. Now, what has happened under that guaranty of $2.20 a bushel?

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEVER. I am sorry I can not. I have only a little time remaining. I want to get this thing straightened out. What has happened under that guaranty? Has it worked out? Have the farmers increased production? The indications are that we are going to produce the largest crop of wheat this year that has ever been harvested in this country. [Applause.] I agree with gentlemen that two things entered into this large production. One is that the farmer, sensible as he always is, knew that it was better business for him to plant a crop upon which he had a guaranty against loss than to plant crops which were speculative in their outcome. The other is that the farmer of this country is patriotic, and has responded to the demand of the times. [Applause.] Now, there you are. What else? When this question was up before, I said that the Congress of the United States ought not to be called upon to fix the price of farm products, that this is not the proper body to do it. This body may with safety delegate that power; but the moment Congress undertakes that rôle, it transfers every speculative exchange in this country in all kinds of products to the Capital of the United States. [Applause.] You can not afford to do it. Members of Congress are human. Members of Congress are humanly weak, and they try to vote the convictions of their constituents; and in these days of dire stress men have got to rise above the selfishness of a situation. [Applause.]

Now, I want to call your attention to another fact. This bill has been in conference for several months. Notwithstanding some statements made in another body, the delay has not been due to any fault on the part of the House conferees. There have been but 24 hours' delay occasioned by the House conferees, and the chairman of the House conferees had a good reason for that delay. He was working in the interest of this legislation at the time. The delay has been due to other causes, which Members in both bodies, if they will make inquiry, can learn about, and I resent the imputation that the House has deliberately delayed this legislation. We have not.

Now, another thing. It is the unbroken rule in the Congress of the United States that that body which proposes legislation upon an appropriation bill, when the two Houses are deadlocked, should recede. This legislation is proposed on an appropriation bill. It would not have stood against a point of order on the floor of this House. It was put on by the Senate. We have been in deadlock for months. It is up to the other body under the precedents and under the rules to recede. It is not up to this House to recede.

Mr. STEENERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEVER. Oh, I can not. I am sorry. Now, another thing.

Mr. STEENERSON. The gentleman knows that appropriation bills all originate in the House, so that his rule would exclude all Senate amendments proposing legislation.

Mr. LEVER. Of course, the gentleman knows that. The gentleman from South Carolina is not a complete fool.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEVER. Just for a question.

Mr. MONDELL. Is the gentleman willing to apply to the District of Columbia appropriation bill the rule he has just announced?

Mr. LEVER. I am not familiar with the District of Columbia appropriation bill. Now, another thing. I said in my statement before that one of the moving causes for the attitude of the House is the fact that Canada, after we fixed the minimum guaranty for wheat in this country for the crop of 1918 at $2.20 at certain markets, immediately followed suit by fixing the guaranty for wheat in Canada upon exactly the same basis. I say to you that we are under obligation to the allies of this country who, through the wheat corporation, are helping us maintain the price of wheat above this guaranty and who are going to help us maintain it for this crop. Ah, I want to say to these gentlemen who criticize this legislation that if you were to take the regulations off, if you were to take from wheat this governmental guaranty, with the strong arm of the Treasury back of it, with the prospect of an enormous yield of wheat in this country for this year, with oceanic transportation tied up as it is, we would not be able to maintain the price of wheat above the level of $1.25 or $1.50 a bushel.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEVER. Yes.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Does the gentleman think the price of wheat would be $1 or $1.25 a bushel when the great majority of people are eating war bread to-day?

Mr. LEVER. The gentleman from Missouri does not know the situation. The food-control bill was written into law following three of the shortest wheat crops we ever had in this country. There was an enormous shortage of wheat. Something had to be done to control the situation. It was an unusual situation. It was a dangerous situation. It was a situation that demanded extraordinary methods to meet it, and we met it by this legislation. The situation is not so bad to-day. You are going to have more wheat than you know what to do with. I stand here to predict to you in the presence of the great chairman of the great Appropriation Committee that when this Congress meets again he will be called upon to appropriate millions to maintain this guaranty that we have made to the farmers of this country. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from South Carolina has expired and all time has expired. The Chair wants the House to understand how this vote is to be taken. The first vote is to be taken on the Morgan proposition, the second vote on the McLaughlin proposition, and the third on the Cooper proposition. If it had not been for the unanimous-consent agreement secured by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] the Chair would put the proposition of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] first.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the motion of the gentleman from Oklahoma be put first and the motion of the gentleman from Wisconsin next.

The SPEAKER. But the unanimous-consent agreement was the other way, and the Chair is governed by it. The question is, first, on the $2.65 proposition, offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma.

The question was taken, and the motion was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the McLaughlin proposition, to recede and concur and fix the price of wheat at $2.40.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were yeas 150, nays 107, answered "present" 4, not voting 170, as follows:

Mr. HOLLINGSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I desire to vote "yea."

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman in the Hall listening?

Mr. HOLLINGSWORTH. No; I thought it was an automatic call.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman does not bring himself within the rules.

Mr. McKINLEY. Mr. Speaker, I voted "yea," but I am paired with Mr. SLAYDEN, and I desire to withdraw my vote and answer "present."

The name of Mr. MCKINLEY was called, and he answered "Present."

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I was requested by my colleague Mr. CRAMTON to say that if he were present he would vote for the increased price of wheat.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to state that my colleague Mr. WILLIAMS is unavoidably absent, and if he had been here he would have voted "yea."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

On motion of Mr. MCLAUGHLIN of Michigan, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the motion was agreed to was laid on the table.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, are there any other motions to be voted on?

The SPEAKER. It seems to the Chair that this vote settles the whole matter.

Mr. LEVER. I think so myself. I desire to make a brief statement, and I would like to have the attention of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MCLAUGHLIN]. If the gentleman will return to amendment No. 44, line 16, page 99, and follow me, he will see that there is a grammatical error in it. I read:

That whenever the President shall find that an emergency exists requiring stimulation of the production of wheat and that it is essential that the producers of wheat, produced within the United States, shall have the benefits from time to time, seasonably and as far in advance of seeding time as practicable to determine—

And so forth.

There is no predicate there. The language of the original act is:

That whenever the President shall find that an emergency exists requiring stimulation of the production of wheat, and that it is essential that the producers of wheat, produced within the United States, shall shall have the benefits of guaranty provided for in this section, he is authorized, from time to time—

And so forth.

I am going to submit a request for unanimous consent that the conferees be authorized to correct that error.

Mr. HAUGEN. Ought not the correction be made now?

Mr. LEVER. I shall ask unanimous consent that the correction be now made before the matter goes to conference.

Mr. CANNON. Have it done by way of amendment, so that there will be a disagreement; because as I understand it, the Senate now adopts our practice of making the point of order that would defeat the conference report unless there is a disagreement between the two Houses.

Mr. STEENERSON. Does this proposed amendment make it correspond to the existing law?

Mr. LEVER. Yes. Perhaps the best way would be to move to amend the McLaughlin amendment by putting in this language.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent to amend the McLaughlin amendment by a certain change in the grammatical form, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 99, line 19, after the word "benefits," the last word in the line, insert the words "of the guaranty provided for in this section, he is authorized," so that the amended language will read:

"SEC. 14. That whenever the President shall find that an emergency exists requiring stimulation of the production of wheat and that it is essential that the producers of wheat, produced within the United States, shall have the benefits of guaranty provided for in this section, he is authorized, from time to time," etc.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, in order to make it regular it seems to me that this ought to be an amendment to the Senate amendment and not an amendment to the McLaughlin proposition, and I ask unanimous consent that it may be considered as an amendment to the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that this language shall be agreed to as an amendment to Senate amendment No. 44. Is there objection?

Mr. MCLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. MCLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Simply to say I think the last request of the gentleman from South Carolina is right, because the words which were omitted were not a part of my amendment but another part of the section altogether.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a further conference and ask that the conferees be appointed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the conferees.

The Clerk read as follows:

Messrs. LEVER, LEE of Georgia, CANDLER of Mississippi, HAUGEN, and MCLAUGHLIN of Michigan.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. ASHBROOK, for an indefienite period, on account of illness; and

To Mr. STRONG, for one week, on account of important business.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Tulley, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed with amendments joint resolution (H. J. Res. 311) entitled "Joint resolution making appropriations for certain necessary operations of the Government and of the District of Columbia for the month of July, 1918, and for other purposes," in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. MORGAN. I make the same request.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request.

Mr. MCLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I make the same request.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make the same request.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I object to any more——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts objects.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I desire to withdraw my objection to the request of the gentlemen from Missouri.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman withdraws his objection to the request of the two gentlemen from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER and Mr. DICKINSON] to extend their remarks. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

STATEMENT.

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 12600) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, and prior fiscal years, on account of war expenses, and for other purposes, submit the following written statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon by the conference committee and submitted in the accompanying conference report as to each of said amendments, namely:

On No. 1: Appropriates $40,000,000 for housing for war needs, instead of $50,000,000 as proposed by the House, and nothing as proposed by the Senate.

On No. 2: Appropriates $25,000, as proposed by the Senate, for additional for a sea wall along the Delaware River at the Frankford Arsenal, and continues during the fiscal year 1919 the appropriation of $36,000 made for that purpose for the fiscal year 1918.

On No. 3: Appropriates $33,000,000, as proposed by the Senate, to fulfill contract obligations for medical supplies for the Army.

On No. 4: Strikes out the appropriation of $10,000, proposed by the Senate, to enable the Geological Survey to explore and make accessible water holes on arid lands in the West.

On Nos. 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, and 10, relating to the Senate: Appropriates for employees and expenses of the Senate in amounts proposed by the Senate.

On Nos. 11 and 12: Appropriates $2,000 each to Mark R. Bacon and Samuel W. Beakes, for expenses in a contested-election case determined by the Committee on Elections No. 3.

On No. 13: Inserts the paragraph, proposed by the Senate, increasing the pay of linotype and monotype operators, makers up, proof readers, pressmen, compositors, bookbinders, and bookbinding machine operators in the Government Printing Office.

On Nos. 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, and 19: Appropriates, as proposed by the Senate, for the payment of judgments rendered by the Court of Claims and certified to Congress after the bill had passed the House.

On No. 20: Strikes out the paragraph, proposed by the Senate, for payment of interest on certain items in a judgment rendered by the Court of Claims, May 18, 1905, in favor of the Cherokee Nation.

On No. 21: Appropriates, as proposed by the Senate, for claims allowed by the accounting officers of the Treasury Department and certified to Congress for payment after the bill had passed the House.

SWAGAR SHERLEY,
JOHN J. EAGAN,
J. G. CANNON,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, the differences between the House and the Senate on the general deficiency bill were touching matters which were more or less inconsequential with two exceptions. The House will recall that as the bill passed the House it carried provision for $50,000,000 additional for housing purposes in connection with war activities. The Senate struck out that provision which increased the authorization from $60,000,000 to $110,000,000 and provided the $50,000,000 additional. The conferees agreed to $40,000,000 in place of the House provision of $50,000,000. It was strongly urged by the Senate that this gave a total of $100,000,000 to the Housing Commission and that that sum was more than sufficient to enable them to do all pending work that was pressing, and that if later on, after they had had some experience, it was found that additional moneys were desired then the Congress could determine whether or not such additional amounts should be granted; but in view of the fact that the Senate had insisted on no allowance, no additional sum, the conferees on the part of the House felt warranted in agreeing to this compromise which gave $40,000,000 in place of the $50,000,000. The other item of magnitude is one relating to $33,000,000 asked for by the Medical Corps of the Army to take care of contract authorizations heretofore authorized in one of the previous deficiency bills. It was urged that this indebtedness was incurred and incurred under authority to incur it, and that it ought not to be taken out of the funds for the fiscal year 1919 even if those funds were available for that purpose. As to the latter there seems to be some question, but its being an actual deficiency and authorized the House conferees agreed to the Senate amendment. Now, there are a number of minor amendments which the report deals with, but none of them as I now recall are of any great importance.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman give the number of those two amendments?

Mr. SHERLEY. Amendment No. 1 is the one relating to housing for war needs, and No. 3 was the amendment relating to the $33,000,000 for the medical supplies of the Army. A number of the other amendments that the House receded from were amendments relating to the expenses of the Senate. As Members are aware, it is customary for one House, in the absence of some overwhelming reason to the contrary, to acquiesce in the amendments touching the expenses of the other body. There was also put on in the Senate, at the suggestion of the House, a provision for the payment of $2,000 each in the contest between Mr. Bacon and Mr. BEAKES for a seat in this House. At the time the bill was prepared in the House the Election Committee having that contest before them had not made the formal certification of these election expenses and therefore we were unable to carry it.

There was an amendment, also, touching the payment of certain interest upon a debt due to the Indians, that the Senate receded from, the House urging the recession on the ground that the decision of the Court of Claims was a decision for the payment of money into the Treasury, whereas the form of the Senate amendment seemed to authorize the payment of the additional interest to an agent of this tribe. And inasmuch as the Senate had passed a bill dealing with the matter, which is on the Speaker's table, and that there has been a House bill reported out by the Committee on Indian Affairs, and there was some question as to whether this was not a claim rather than a judgment, it was believed by the conferees it was better that the matter come up in a formal way, by consideration in either the Senate or the House bill, and not be acted on in connection with the conference report, where the opportunity for full inquiry did not present itself.

Now, if there are any other matters——

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. I notice that on pages 33 to 40, inclusive, in the printed bill there evidently has been a mistake made by including some pension claims, and I wondered whether these items were in the original papers?

Mr. SHERLEY. That was simply a mistake in binding the unofficial copy which the gentleman has.

Mr. WALSH. It seems to be just one section.

Mr. SHERLEY. I will say to the gentleman we carry in this bill no claims as such; I mean claims in the full sense of the term. Nothing but what are judgments or audited claims, which are always paid on presentaion, did we carry into the bill.

Mr. WALSH. I simply wanted to make sure they were not in the original papers.

Mr. SHERLEY. I am obliged to the gentleman.

Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote on the conference report.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. LAZARO, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 12600. An act making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, and prior fiscal years, on account of war expenses, and for other purposes.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan, by unanimous consent, was granted leave of absence indefinitely on account of important business.

DISPOSITION OF NOBEL AWARD TO MR. ROOSEVELT.

Mr. GALLIVAN and Mr. JONES rose.

The SPEAKER. Which gentleman addressed the Chair?

Mr. GALLIVAN. I did. I ask unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GALLIVAN. Mr. Speaker, I have just received a communication from a former President of the United States, which I have been asked to lay before the House immediately, and I do not propose to do other than read his letter, which is as follows:

NEW YORK, July 2, 1918.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN GALLIVAN: After the peace of Portsmouth I was awarded the Nobel prize medal. This carried with it the gift to me of the sum of about $40,000. The gift was to me outright, but I did not care to use it for myself under the circumstances, so I gave it as a foundation for an industrial peace fund. Congress created a commission to receive and use it. It seems, however, that it did not prove practicable to make the use intended of the money. Nothing whatever has been done with it and it still is in the hands of the commissioners. We are now in a great crisis and the utmost demand is being made upon the charity of every man and woman, rich or poor. Under these circumstances I do not think it right that this money should lie idle; and I do think it most appropriate that the Nobel peace prize fund should be used through appropriate organizations to care for our soldiers, and for the widows and children and mothers of our soldiers in this great war, waged to secure the only kind of peace worth having—the peace which is founded on right and justice and mercy.

Accordingly I am writing to you and to Senator WILLIAMS to ask if you will not put this communication immediately before the two Houses of Congress. I desire Congress to give me back, or rather authorize and direct the commissioners created under the prior law of Congress to give me back, the Nobel peace prize fund. I shall then at once apply it for purposes above indicated, through the Red Cross, the Young Men's Christian Association (both white and colored branches), the Knights of Columbus, the Jewish war fund, and any similar organizations which I may think at the moment would do peculiarly good work. At the end of the year I will report to you and to Senator WILLIAMS the exact disposition made of the fund, sending you if you so desire the full correspondence, the stubs of the checks, etc.

I feel that, as the money was given to me to be used as I desired, the proper course to take is the one I have requested. But I feel much more strongly that in any event the money should no longer remain as a "talent wrapped in a napkin and buried in the ground," but should be used to help meet the needs created by this terrible war. Accordingly if there is objection to having me receive and dispose of it as above outlined, I ask that the money be turned over to a committee composed of yourself and Senator WILLIAMS and the Speaker of the House, who will report by the end of the year to Congress the disposal of the funds they have made; or, if you feel that such extra work should be undertaken by those not pressed by public business, I suggest that you turn the money over to a committee of three, consisting of Mrs. Thomas J. Preston, widow of the late President Cleveland; Maurice Egan, late minister to Denmark; and Nathaniel Elsberg, former State senator of New York. They could report in similar fashion.

The essential thing is that immediate action be taken. Senator LODGE and Congressman LONGWORTH know about the fund, and Mr. Oscar Straus is one of the gentlemen now interested with its administration. I think the Chief Justice is another. I do not see that there can be any objection on grounds of policy to using this idle money immediately for this most worthy of purposes. If there is objection to the money being distributed as above outlined by me, the doner, then I request that either of the committees I have suggested, or some similar committee which may commend itself to your judgment, be appointed to distribute the fund. In any event I trust there will be immediate action.

Faithfully, yours,

(Signed) THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

Hon. JAMES A. GALLIVAN,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

"SEC. 10. That section 125 of said act be, and is hereby, amended by striking out the period at the end thereof, substituting therefor a colon, and adding thereafter the following: 'Provided, That hereafter, upon the discharge or furlough to the reserve of an enlisted man, all uniform outer clothing then in his possession, except such articles as he may be permitted to wear from the place of termination of his active service to his home, as authorized by this section, will be retained for military use; and within four months after such termination of his active service he shall return all uniform clothing, which he was so permitted to retain for wear to his home, by mail, under a franked label which shall be furnished him for the purpose, and in conformity with the instructions given him at the time of such termination of his active service; and in case he shall fail to return the same within such period, and in accordance with such instructions, he shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, upon conviction, suffer the punishment prescribed by this section: Provided further, That upon the release from Federal service of an enlisted man of the National Guard called as such into the service of the United States, all uniform outer clothing then in his possession shall be taken up and accounted for as property issued to the National Guard of the State to which the enlisted man belongs, in the manner prescribed by section 67 of said act: And provided further, That when an enlisted man is discharged otherwise than honorably, all uniform outer clothing in his possession shall be retained for military use, and when authorized by regulations prescribed by the Secretary of War, a suit of citizen's outer clothing to cost not exceeding $15 may be issued to such enlisted man: And provided further, That officers and members of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers may, regardless of the preceding provisions of said act, wear such uniforms as the Secretary of War may authorize.'

"Transportation of baggage of deceased civilian employees: That hereafter, under such regulations as the Secretary of War may prescribe, transportation at public expense may be provided for the baggage of civilian employees who die in the service from their last duty station to such places within the limits of the United States as may be the home of their families or as may be designated by their legal representatives or executors.

"Extension of time for transmitting money accounts: That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized in time of war, upon request to the Secretary of War, to extend the period during which money accounts covering expenditures from appropriations for the Army may be transmitted to the Auditor for the War Department after their receipt in the War Department from 60 to 90 days.

"CHAPTER XIX.

J., or at any Government ordnance proving ground that may be established elsewhere on or near such waters, and of any portion or area of said waters occupied by submarine mines, mine fields, submarine cables, or other material and accessories pertaining to seacoast fortifications, or by any plant or facility engaged in the execution of any public project of river and harbor improvement; and the said Secretary shall have like power to regulate the transportation of explosives upon any of said waters: Provided, That the authority hereby conferred shall be so exercised as not unreasonably to interfere with or restrict the food-fishing industry, and the regulations prescribed in pursuance hereof shall provide for the use of such waters by food fishermen operating under permits granted by the War Department.

"SEC. 4. That offenses against the provisions of this chapter, or any regulation made pursuant thereto, committed in any Territory or other place subject to the jurisdiction of the United States where there is no court having general jurisdiction of crimes against the United States, shall be cognizable in any court of such place or Territory having original jurisdiction of criminal cases in the place or Territory in which the offense has been committed, with the same right of appeal in all cases as is given in other criminal cases where imprisonment not exceeding six months forms a part of the penalty, and jurisdiction is hereby conferred upon such courts and such courts shall exercise the same for such purposes; and in case any such offense be committed beyond the territorial jurisdiction of any court having jurisdiction thereof, the offense shall be deemed and held to have been committed within the jurisdiction in which the offender may be found or into which he is first brought, and shall be tried by the court having jurisdiction thereof.

"CHAPTER XX.

"Proceeds from operation of public utilities: That, in case of actual or threatened hostilities, any proceeds received from the operation of a public utility, in connection with engineer operations in the field overseas, shall be available for the purpose of such utility until the close of the fiscal year following that in which the proceeds are received, and a detailed report of such proceeds and application thereof shall be rendered to Congress on forms conforming as far as practicable to those used by American companies in reports to the Interstate Commerce Commission: Provided, That the provision of the act of March 23, 1910, making moneys arising from the disposition of serviceable quartermaster material available for the purposes of the appropriation throughout the fiscal year following that in which the disposition was effected, is hereby extended to apply to material supplied to the Army by the Engineer Department.

"Retired officers on active duty: That when any retired officer of the Army is, in the discretion of the President, employed on active duty and assigned to duty in an arm, corps, department, or organization, he shall, for all purposes, except promotion, be considered an officer of such arm, corps, department, or organization while so serving, and shall be an extra number therein.

"John Q. A. A. Brett, who was appointed to the grade of first lieutenant in the Quartermaster Corps pursuant to the act of August 29, 1916, and who had over 31 years' service as pay clerk, United States Army."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 116: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 116, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Insert, before the word "That," at the beginning of the amendment, a subhead as follows: "Appointment of cadets, Military Academy:"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 118: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 118, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate insert "Chapter XXIII"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 123: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 123, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 1, page 86, of the engrossed amendments strike out "XXVI" and insert "XXIV"; in line 2, page 86, of the engrossed amendments before the word "That," insert a subhead as follows: "Condemnation of property for generating electric energy"; in line 14, page 86, of the engrossed amendments strike out "power plant, or" and insert "line or lines"; in line 17, page 86, of the engrossed amendments strike out all after the word "That" down to and including the word "war," in line 21, and insert "nothing herein shall be construed to authorize the appropriation of any property already devoted to such use"; in line 15, page 89, of the engrossed amendments strike out the word "Act" and insert "Chapter"; in line 15 and 16, page 89, of the engrossed amendments strike out the words "the right" and insert "any franchise"; in line 16, page 89, of the engrossed amendments strike out the word "operate" and insert "utilize"; and the Senate agree to the same.

STATEMENT.

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 12281) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, submit the following written statement explaining the effect of the action agreed on:

On amendment No. 1 the House receded. This is merely a matter of phraseology.

On amendment No. 2 the House receded, and allowed $500,000 in addition to the House provision for the military information section. This section is doing a very important work in connection with the secret service of the Army.

On amendment No. 3 the Senate receded. This amendment authorized commanding officers to exchange old articles for new ones.

On Nos. 4 and 5 the House receded. These do not make any change other than in verbiage and provide a heading to the item.

On Nos. 6 and 7 the House receded. This changes the phraseology so as to make the language, as it is supposed, more specific.

On Nos. 8 and 9 the House receded. These relate to telephone service in the District of Columbia and toll messages in the Secretary of War's office, so that the same may be handled directly instead of through the Signal Corps.

On No. 10 the House receded, yielding to the Senate provision for a heading for the item.

The House receded on Nos. 11, 12, 13, and 14, which add the words "enlargement, balloon schools, and Government property." This, it was thought, would make the language more specific.

On No. 15 the House receded. This merely strikes out the word "provided."

On Nos. 16 and 17 the House receded. This is a mere transposition of the language.

The House receded on No. 18. This amendment authorizes the President to apportion and allot money for aviation purposes. It also contains a proviso that college education shall not be necessary to qualify a cadet, pilot, military aviator, or other officer in the Aviation Service.

The House receded on Nos. 19, 20, 21, and 22, which provide headings for the paragraphs.

The House receded on Nos. 23 and 24, which are mere changes in phraseology.

The House receded on Nos. 25 and 26, which provide headings for the paragraph.

The House receded with an amendment on No. 27, which authorizes the sale of any building, including the lands upon which any plant or factory is situated. The amendment adds, after the word "factory," in line 23, the following: "acquired since April 6, 1917."

The Senate receded on No. 28, which was a mere repetition of what had gone before.

The House receded on No. 29, extending the sale of guns and ammunition to members of the National Rifle Association and other organizations for the encouragement of small-arms target practice.

The House receded on No. 30 in order to make the language of the section conform to the rest of it.

The House receded on No. 31. There are two provisos in this amendment, the first of which authorizes moneys received from the sale to be deposited to the credit of the appropriation out of which it was originally purchased, and the second authorizes the allotment of $100,000 to the Aircraft Board for the conduct of its business.

On No. 32: The House receded on a mere matter of phraseology.

On No. 33: The House receded, agreeing to the Senate provision for a heading for the item.

On No. 34: The House receded on a matter of phraseology.

On Nos. 35, 36, and 37: The House receded on a heading for the item and a change of phraseology.

On No. 38: The House receded on a heading for the item.

On No. 39: The House receded, giving to Army field clerks allowances and benefits of pay clerks of the Quartermaster Corps and providing that the minimum pay shall be $1,200, and authorizing the same increase for foreign service as is allowed to commissioned officers.

The Senate receded on No. 40, which undertook to extend the war-risk insurance to women serving by official designation overseas as telephone and telegraph operators.

The House receded on No. 41. This is taken care of in the reorganization of the Nurse Corps later in the bill.

The House receded on No. 42 with an amendment. The House yielded on that part of the amendment providing for the appointment of two extra major generals of the line. This is in order to take care of a complicated situation in the Ordnance Department and Quartermaster Corps, and was earnestly urged by the Secretary of War. That portion of this amendment providing for a lieutenant general was stricken out.

The Senate receded on No. 43, which authorized certain retired officers detailed at the Soldiers' Home to be considered on active duty during the war.

The House receded on No. 44. This language is considered necessary in order to carry into effect the law providing commutation of quarters for officers on duty in the field and on foreign service.

The House receded on Nos. 45 and 46, which merely provide a heading for the item.

The Senate receded on No. 47, which leaves the amount as fixed by the House.

The House receded on No. 48, which simply authorizes light and heat for buildings upon military reservations authorized by War Department regulations.

On No. 49 the House receded with an amendment, making the amount $35,000,000 instead of $20,000,000, as provided by the House, and $37,456,787, as provided by the Senate. This increase is due to the fact that payments for damages to private parties for damage by our troops in France are to be taken care of in the last clause of this item.

The House receded on No. 50, which is a proviso merely giving the Secretary of War authority, in his discretion, to connect the water mains of Fort Crook, Nebr., with the city of Omaha. This does not increase the amount.

The Senate receded on No. 51, which provided $100,000 for a filtration plant at Camp Doniphan.

The Senate receded on No. 52, which made it compulsory for the Government to furnish uniforms to officers.

The House receded with an amendment on No. 53, by which the amount was increased from the House figures of $143,603,037 to $147,000,000. The figures provided by the House were those asked for by the department, and the increase was subsequently applied for in the Senate.

On No. 54 the House receded with an amendment, adding $100,000 to the House appropriation under the item "For barracks and quarters."

On No. 55 the House receded, agreeing to the Senate provision for a heading for the item.

On No. 56 the House receded, which is a change of phraseology.

On No. 57 the Senate receded. This provided for the transfer of Point Fermin light station, San Pedro, Cal., from the control of the Department of Commerce to the War Department.

On Nos. 58 and 59 the Senate receded, leaving the amounts as fixed by the House.

On No. 60 the House receded. This merely carries into effect the provision for the transfer of certain lands at Presidio, San Francisco, as heretofore authorized.

On No. 61 the House receded with an amendment, making the total appropriation $80,000,000 instead of $60,000,000, as provided by the House, and $83,653,612, as provided by the Senate. This is for the construction of hospitals, and the House conferees thought perhaps they might not make a mistake in adding to this appropriation.

On No. 62 the House receded, with an amendment providing for the payment of $71,000 to the heirs or legal representatives of citizens of the United States killed on the Mexican border, in pursuance to facts ascertained under joint resolution approved August 9, 1912. The rest of the Senate provision was stricken out by the conferees.

On Nos. 63 and 64 the House receded in a slight change of verbiage.

The House receded, with amendments, on No. 65. This relates to the increase of the Medical Department. The substance of the amendments provide one Assistant Surgeon General, with the rank of major general, for service abroad during the present war, instead of an Assistant Surgeon General with the rank of major general, as provided by the Senate, regardless of the place of service. The Senate amendment authorized the appointment of four major generals and eight brigadier generals in the Medical Department of the National Army. The conferees agreed on two major generals and four brigadier generals. The amendment also provides for the increase of rank in the Medical Reserve Corps to colonel, and provides for their proportionate distribution as provided by law for the Medical Corps of the Army rather than the Navy. The conferees struck out that portion of the amendment authorizing the designation of consultant officers.

The Senate amendment also provided for three Assistant Surgeon Generals, with the rank of brigadier general, for the Medical Department of the Regular Army. The conferees reduced that number to two.

On No. 66 the Senate receded. This provided for the restoration of all Government employees who enter the Army after the expiration of their military service.

On No. 67 the House receded, agreeing to the Senate amendment providing for a heading for the item.

On No. 68 the Senate receded. This provision required that enlisted or drafted men assigned to factories, etc., should receive the same pay as civilians.

On No. 69 the House receded with an amendment. This simply authorizes a band for each regiment of Engineers.

The Senate receded on No. 70, which provided for the equipment, maintenance, and training of foreign troops on American soil.

On No. 71 the House receded with an amendment, striking out the words in lines 3 and 4, page 69, "Empire of which he and his race have been unwilling subjects," and inserting in lieu thereof "Imperial Governments of Germany and Austro-Hungary."

The Senate receded on No. 72, which is the so-called Russian Legion.

The House receded on No. 73, which authorizes the Secretary of War to pay civilian employees in gun factories and arsenals for work done during leave of absence.

On No. 74 the House receded with an amendment. This is a redraft of the medal-of-honor bill, which is adopted substantially as prepared by the War Department. It provides for medals of honor, distinguished-service crosses, and distinguished-service medals. It also authorizes our soldiers to receive foreign decorations from foreign Governments. It further empowers the President to bestow medals and decorations upon officers and men of the forces of our cobelligerents. It further provides for a bronze medal for soldiers of the Spanish-American War and on the Mexican border.

The House receded on No. 75, providing a heading for the item.

The Senate receded on No. 76, which authorized war material to be admitted free of duty.

The House receded on No. 77, providing a heading for the item.

The House receded on No. 78, striking out the word "Provided."

The House receded on No. 79, providing longevity pay for officers of the National Guard and Militia who have entered the forces of the United States otherwise than under section 111 of the act of June 3, 1916.

The House receded on No. 80, providing a heading for the item.

The House receded on Nos. 81 and 82, intended merely to make the language more explicit.

The House receded on Nos. 83 and 84, providing for a heading for the item and striking out the words "Provided further."

The Senate receded on No. 85, providing for the purchase of real estate for military purposes.

The House receded on No. 86, making appropriations for Leon Springs Military Reservation, Tex. This is recommended by the War Department and has been approved by the Military Committee of the House.

The House receded on No. 87. This is the case of Bertram T. Clayton, late a cadet at the United States Military Academy, who had to leave the academy on account of tuberculosis while in attendance as a cadet. It simply retires him as a second lieutenant, as was done last year by Congress in the Military Academy bill in the cases of two other cadets whose cases occurred at the same time.

The House receded on No. 88, authorizing Col. David L. Brainard to be put on the retired list as a brigadier general, on account of his service with the Greely expedition. A private bill on this subject has been favorably reported by the Military Committee of the House.

The House receded on No. 89, with an amendment, providing that the appropriations shall be available for the payment of obligations incurred prior to the passage of the act. The amendment strikes out the last words, making the appropriation immediately available, as unnecessary.

The House receded on Nos. 90, 91, 92, and 93, which provide for a chapter and a heading for each of these items.

The House receded on No. 94. The object of this amendment is to authorize the appointment of the adjutant generals of the States, in addition to officers of the National Guard, as property and disbursing officers of the United States, it being held that the adjutant general was not an officer of the National Guard.

On No. 95 the House receded with an amendment. This provides a chapter and a heading and new language to the effect that pressing obligations may be paid by the disbursing officer of the Army or person authorized to make payment from the total available balance to the official credit, if sufficient funds under proper appropriations have been apportioned by the chief officer of the bureau for the expenditure. The accounts of the disbursing officer must show the change of the proper appropriations. The amendment strikes out lines 24 and 25, page 96, and inserts in lieu thereof the following: "the allotment to his official credit under the proper appropriation or appropriations is temporarily insufficient to pay the same," and in line 7, page 97, after the word "appropriations," inserts the word "and," and after the word "balances," same line, inserts the word "there."

On No. 96 the House receded with an amendment. This provides for a reorganization of Nurse Corps. It increases the pay but reduces the amount allowed by the Senate. The conferees struck out section 4 of the Senate bill, providing for retirement.

The House receded on No. 97, providing for the payment of claims of enlisted men for the loss of private property. This is a redraft of an old act of 1885, so as to make it applicable in time of war and to make payments more prompt through the order of the commanding officer.

The House receded on No. 98, providing a chapter and heading, with a new proviso, so as to suspend the operation of a law restricting the purchase and distribution of military stores and supplies to the Quartermaster Corps.

The House receded on No. 99, providing a chapter and heading, and also new language, authorizing the President to care for discharged soldiers and sailors of foreign countries on account of physical disability who happen to be in our service, provided the Governments of our cobelligerents make similar provision for our citizens, and that the care and treatment shall not exceed that given to the members of the Army and Navy of the United States.

The House receded on No. 100, providing a chapter and heading and new language. This amendment provides for a mine-planter service. This is the same language as a bill reported by the Military Committee of the House and adopted by the House.

On No. 101 the House receded, providing for a chapter and heading and new language. This amends article 52 of the Articles of War, authorizing the suspension of sentences by the authority competent to execute same, except it does not extend to death. It also amends article 53, by providing when a sentence of dishonorable discharge has been suspended the execution or remission, if the soldier be confined in the disciplinary barracks, must be directed by the Secretary of War. Article 57 is amended so as to dispense with monthly accounts. This is done because under regulations these accounts are now made daily and there is no necessity for their repetition. Article 112 provides for the disposition of personal effects of those who die in the military service, without going through the legal proceedings and formalities now necessary. It names the parties in the order of priority of right to receive the same.

The House receded on No. 102, providing a chapter and heading and new language. This is intended to legalize what was done prior to the passage of the so-called quota or classification bill.

The House receded on No. 103, providing a chapter and heading and new language, which authorizes the registration for military service of aliens residing in the United States with whose Government the United States has concluded an agreement for draft into the military service.

The House receded on No. 104, with amendments as follows: Before the language contained in the amendment of the Senate insert: "That the second sentence of section 2 of the act of May 18, 1917, be amended so as to read as follows." Strike out, in line 25, page 113, and line 1, page 114, "or aliens not enemies who are covered by treaties or conventions as provided in Chapter XII of this act."

The House receded on No. 105, providing a chapter and heading and new language. This provides for the voluntary enlistment in the staff corps of persons between the ages of 41 and 55.

The House receded on No. 106, providing a chapter and heading and new language. This amends the law in regard to prostitution within a reasonable distances of military camps, etc., so as to take care of cases of prostitutes otherwise than in bawdy houses and like places.

On No. 107: The House receded, agreeing to the Senate provision for a chapter and heading and new language. This provides for the creation of a hygiene board for the investigation of venereal diseases.

The House receded on No. 108, with an amendment. The conferees struck out the Senate amendment and substituted an entirely new amendment, by which the act of July 2, 1917, as amended by the act of April 11, 1918, is amended so as to authorize condemnation proceedings necessary for the Army, Navy, and United States Shipping Board or Emergency Fleet Corporation. It confers the right to institute condemnation proceedings upon the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, and the chairman of the United States Shipping Board. The right to condemn is for the purpose of obtaining property needed for the production, manufacture, or building of aircraft, dry docks, or vessels. The jurisdiction is vested in the United States district courts where the property is sought to be condemned, regardless of value. The President is authorized to dispose of property so obtained.

The House receded on No. 109, providing a chapter and heading and new language. This provides for an Aircraft Production Corporation. It carries an appropriation of $100,000,000 for the purchase, manufacture, and production and sale of aircraft, the United States at all times to be a majority stockholder.

On No. 110 the House receded with various amendments. This is what is known as the omnibus bill, containing various amendments of the national-defense act, together with certain additional amendments, which appear in the bill as passed by the Senate as sections 2 to 15, inclusive, of the amendment No. 110.

The conferees struck out the following language in lines 8 and 9, page 128, of the amendment proposed by the Senate to section 10 of the national-defense act: "and by striking out the eighth proviso of the third paragraph of said section." The object of this amendment to section 10 is to place the enlisted personnel of ambulance companies and field hospitals on a parity with those of other organizations having animal-drawn transportation. The farrier's pay is $21; the stable sergeant's pay is $36. As a consequence there is a constant tendency on the part of the men concerned to seek transfer to other branches of the service at a higher rate of pay. The stable sergeant will perform practically the same work as that performed by a farrier. It is, of course, understood that a farrier performs, in a limited way at least, the duties of a veterinarian. The duties of the farrier in this respect will be performed by the stable sergeant.

The purpose of the amendment with respect to officers of the Medical Reserve Corps is as follows: There are in the Medical Corps of the Army at the present time 25 officers of the Medical Reserve Corps who have served from 13 years and 3 months to 28 years and 4 months as contract surgeons and first lieutenants of the Medical Reserve Corps. They are above the statutory age limit to enter the regular service and are without hope for the future. It is therefore deemed appropriate that these 25 officers be given an opportunity to enter the Medical Corps as first lieutenants and take their chances for promotion in the future. It is proposed to give them limited opportunity for retirement, service as contract surgeons being considered.

The amendment of section 22, as proposed by the Senate, was agreed to. This amendment is desired by the War Department in order to provide pay for certain enlisted men to make their pay commensurate with the duties actually performed. At each of the recruiting stations of the Army one sergeant belonging to the detachment is detailed as acting first sergeant and post quartermaster sergeant for the detachment. It is evident that the pay of these deserving men should be made to correspond to the importance of the duties performed by them.

The amendment of section 24, as proposed by the Senate, was agreed to. There are two reasons for this amendment: (1) By the Army appropriation act approved May 12, 1917, two amendments were made to this section. The first of these amendments purported to set forth six different classifications from which cadets might be appointed to the United States Military Academy. As appearing in the statutes, however, two of these classifications are missing. It is the purpose of the first part of the present amendment to correct that error. (2) The original section provided for the filling of vacancies "created or caused by the increases due to this act." As all such increases have now been filled, the section has been correspondingly changed in the present amendment so as to cover "all vacancies however arising." Because of this fact, also, the first and second provisos of the original section can no longer have force or effect. Therefore, in making the redraft, these two provisos have been omitted. While making these changes it seemed advisable to bring into the section the second amendment made in the Army appropriation act approved May 12, 1917. This has accordingly been done with slight changes in the way of a more specific statement, but without changing the effect of the former amendment.

The amendment of section 28 of the national defense act, as proposed by the Senate, was disagreed to, except as to what occurs on page 132, between lines 13 and 20, both inclusive. This particular amendment privides for extra pay for military telegraphers. This provision is designed to procure geater efficiency in this banch of the service. It would also harmonize with the provisions of law allowing extra pay to expert marksmen.

The amendment of section 31 of the national-defense act, as proposed by the Senate, was agreed to. Section 31 provides for the Regular Army reserve. Among its provisions is one to the effect that when this reserve or any part thereof is summoned for field training the reservist shall receive "travel allowances and pay at the rate of their respective grades in the Regular Army during such periods of training." It is manifest that under this provision full reimbursement for expenses is not made to the reservist. The amendment strikes out the words quoted above and in lieu thereof inserts provisions which will give full reimbursement for all expenses incurred by the reservist during such period of training.

The amendment of section 42 of the national defense act, as proposed by the Senate, was agreed to. Section 42 authorizes the President to establish units of the Reserve Officers' Training Corps at educational institutions where the authorities agree to establish and maintain a two years' elective or compulsory course of military training, which course, when entered upon by any student, must be completed by him as a prerequisite to graduation. There is no way in which the student may be relieved of the necessity of completing the military training as a prerequisite to graduation, even though from a physical standpoint it should become impossible for him to undergo the training. The proposed amendment is to take care of cases where the professor of military science and tactics is convinced that the student ought not to be obliged to complete his course in military training.

The amendment of section 51 of the national defense act, as proposed by the Senate, was agreed to. Section 51 makes eligible for appointment to the Officers' Reserve Corps, and as a temporary additional second lieutenant, any physically fit male citizen between the ages of 21 and 27 who shall have graduated prior to July 3, 1916, from certain classes of educational institutions. The object of the present amendment is to extend the time within which this privilege may be availed of from June 3, 1916, to July 1, 1919. The law, if thus changed, should give some stimulus to the military courses in the educational institutions mentioned and should produce additional material available for Army service.

The amendment of section 55 of the national defense act, as proposed by the Senate, was agreed to. Section 55 provides for an enlisted reserve corps. While it also provides for ordering members of the reserve into training, it fails to adequately provide for their pay, transportation, and subsistence from the time they leave their homes until they return thereto. The proposed amendment is to correct this deficiency.

The amendment of sections 69 and 111 of the national defense act, as proposed by the Senate, was disagreed to.

The amendment of section 125 of the national defense act, as proposed by the Senate, was agreed to. Section 125 provides for the protection of the uniform of the United States Army. The Army Regulations heretofore attempted to guard against the wearing of the uniform by men discharged from the service, whether honorably or dishonorably. The proposed amendment is intended to give these regulations the force of law by incorporating them in said section 125. In addition, it purposes to provide for furnishing a dishonorably discharged soldier with a suit of citizen's outer clothing not exceeding $15 in cost. This is necessary because an enlisted man is not allowed to have citizen's clothes with him at his stations, and so, upon discharge, would have nothing to wear unless this provision is made. The proposed amendment further permits members of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers to wear such uniforms as the Secretary of War may authorize.

Section 2 of this amendment, providing that the number of privates, first class, shall be one-third of the total number in all branches of the service, was disagreed to.

Section 3 of this amendment was agreed to. This section is designed to permit the utilization of graduates of the Military Academy as instructors at citizens' training camps immediately after their graduation.

Section 4 of this amendment, providing for the transportation at public expense of the mounts of officers who die in the service, was agreed to, with an amendment that transportation must be made within 90 days after the death of the officer.

Section 5 of this amendment, providing for the transportation of baggage of civilian employees who die in the service to their home stations, was agreed to.

Section 6 of this amendment, providing for mileage to officers of the Corps of Engineers, Ordnance Department, and Quartermaster Corps to be paid out of appropriations of the different departments, was disagreed to.

Section 7 of this amendment was agreed to. This section provides that the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized in time of war, upon request of the Secretary of War, to extend the period during which money accounts covering expenditures from appropriations for the Army may be transmitted to the Auditor for the War Department after their receipt in the War Department from 60 to 90 days. The large increase of business in time of war makes such extension necessary.

Section 8 of this amendment was agreed to. This section provides for protection of life and property upon the navigable waters of the United States from dangers incident to Coast Artillery target practice or the proving operations of the Ordnance Department, through authorizing the Secretary of War to prescribe needed regulations with respect to the use and navigation of such waters.

Section 9 of this amendment was agreed to. The Engineering Department constructs and operates railway lines in the field of operations in France. Cost of both construction and operation comes out of the appropriations made for such purpose. The income received from the operation of these utilities ought, therefore, it is thought, to be available for the further use of the Engineering Department for the purposes for which the original appropriation was made. This section is intended to accomplish this result. It contains a provision that such proceeds shall be available until the close of the fiscal year following that in which the proceeds are received. This clause is inserted because of the fact that proceeds received during the months of May and June would not be available for the purposes of the utility if the section provided only that they should be available until the close of the fiscal year in which they were received. The proviso making the provisions of the act of March 23, 1910, making moneys arising from the disposition of serviceable quartermaster material available for the purpose of the appropriation throughout the fiscal year following that in which the disposition was effected, is merely applying to the Engineer Corps a method of administration heretofore approved by Congress when it passed said act of March 23, 1910.

Section 10 of this amendment was agreed to. This section provides that when a retired officer of the Army is, in the discretion of the President, employed on active duty and assigned to duty in an arm, corps, department, or organization, he shall, for all purposes except promotion, be considered an officer of such arm, corps, department, or organization, while so serving, and shall be an extra member therein. This provision is necessary at the present time for the reason that the services of a great number of retired Army officers are being availed of. When an officer is retired from active service he is no longer an officer of the arm or branch from which he is retired, but is simply an Army officer. In many cases the statutes expressly require that certain duties may be performed only by an officer of a certain arm, corps, or department. Manifestly, therefore, such duties may not be performed by a retired officer employed on active duty. For example, an inspection required by statute of soldiers' homes, can be performed only by an officer of the Inspector General's Department, and this is a service that can well be rendered by a retired officer; but unless Congress enacts a law of the kind here proposed a retired officer can not perform such service. A like situation arises in matters for the condemnation of properties. The act of June 15, 1917, makes provision of this kind with respect to retired engineer officers. This was found to be necessary in order that retired officers of the Engineer Corps might be detailed on the commission of the District of Columbia or on the Mississippi River Commission. In the existing war situation it is thought that a general act, such as is now proposed, should be passed in order to give freedom in the use of retired officers.

Section 11 of this amendment, providing that separate battalions, squadrons, of like units of any arm, corps, or department shall consist of such numbers and grades of commissioned officers and enlisted men as the President may prescribe, was disagreed to.

Section 12 of this amendment was agreed to. This amendment is desired because of the fact that in the national-defense act, due undoubtedly to oversight, buglers receive the pay of privates. The injustice of this became at once apparent to organization commanders when they realized that the organization buglers received $3 less pay per month than privates, first class. Frequently buglers are excellent men, and because of the fact that they are efficient buglers they are often held in that grade and not promoted to noncommissioned officers because of difficulty in replacing them as buglers. This amendment provides slightly increased pay for most deserving men whose duties are oftentimes more hazardous than those of the average private. This arises from the fact that they are often out as messengers and signalmen, and hence are required on occasions to expose themselves to a greater degree than is the case with men on the line. This section also makes provision for assignment of buglers with proper grade which shall exist in time of peace as well as in time of war.

Section 13 of this amendment, which provided for the creation of certain grades in motorized organizations, was disagreed to.

Section 14 of this amendment was agreed to. This section authorizes the President to enlist for service in the offices of the War Department, or under its control, or on detached service under its jurisdiction, men outside of the draft ages, and men within the draft ages who have been disqualified by minor physical defects for active service in the Army. It further provides that their pay and allowances "shall be fixed by the President in any amounts not to exceed those of the enlisted men in the Regular Army." The purpose of this section is manifest—to procure more man power in the War Department and its detached services without encroaching upon the class of men that is available for active service in the Army.

Section 15 of this amendment was agreed to. This section provides for placing on the retired list, with the grade of captain, John Q. A. Brett, who was appointed to the grade of first lieutenant in the Quartermaster Corps pursuant to the act of August 29, 1916, after more than 31 years' service as pay clerk in the United States Army.

The House receded on No. 124, with an amendment, striking out the word "any," in line 16, page 151, and inserting in lieu thereof the word "all."

S. H. DENT, Jr.,
W. J. FIELDS,
JULIUS KAHN,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I would like to prefer a unanimous-consent request, with the permission of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT]. I notice that amendment No. 123 provides for a grant of water powers under certain conditions. This provision has never been considered in the House, and I ask unanimous consent that amendment No. 123, as amended by the conferees, be read and the time not taken out of the time in the control of the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. DENT. I have no objection.

PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE—RESTRICTION OF FUEL CONSUMPTION BY BREWERS (H. DOC. NO. 1217).

The SPEAKER laid before the House a message from the President of the United States, which was read and, with the accompanying document, ordered printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Agriculture, as follows:

To the House of Representatives:

In compliance with the resolution of the House of Representatives of June 22, 1918, requesting the President, if not incompatible with the public interest, to report to the House of Representatives whether any order has been issued by the United States Fuel Administration restricting the supply of coal to persons, partnerships, associations, or corporations engaged in the manufacture of brewed malt, fermented, or other intoxicating liquors, and if so, to what extent, I transmit herewith a regulation issued by the United States Fuel Administrator on July 3, 1918, restricting fuel consumption by brewers.

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE, 6 July, 1918.

UNITED STATES FUEL ADMINISTRATION,
Washington, D. C., July 3, 1918.

REGULATION RESTRICTING FUEL CONSUMPTION BY BREWERS.

It appearing to the United States Fuel Administrator, after consultation with the chairman of the War Industries Board, in view of the necessity for conserving the country's resources for the prosecution of the war and in consideration of the increased demand for fuel for industries engaged in the production of munitions and commodities required in the conduct of the war, and the fact that owing to the limitations upon transportation facilities and other causes resulting from the war, there is an insufficient supply of fuel for those purposes and also for all the other purposes existing in normal times, that it is essential to the national security and defense for the successful prosecution of the war, and for the support and maintenance of the Army and Navy, to restrict the consumption of fuel in certain lines of industry; and that among such industries is that of the brewing of beer, ale, porter, and other cereal beverages, as defined in the regulation hereinafter prescribed; and the United States Fuel Administrator hereby finding that the restriction of fuel consumption to the extent specified in said regulation is reasonable, and that such restriction will contribute to the successful outcome of the war through the releasing of fuel and other resources for war purposes, and will result, with other limitations upon the use of fuel in various other lines of industry through the establishing of similar regulations, in an equitable distribution and apportionment of fuel among consumers in accordance with the relatively essential nature of their product to the prosecution of the war;

The United States Fuel Administrator, acting under authority of an Executive order of the President of the United States, dated 23 August, 1917, appointing said administrator, and of subsequent Executive orders, and in furtherance of the purpose of said orders and of the act of Congress therein referred to and approved August 10, 1917, hereby makes and establishes the following regulation, effective until further or other order, and subject to general or specific modification hereafter from time to time, and at any time:

REGULATION RESTRICTING FUEL CONSUMPTION BY BREWERS.

1. That the term "brewer" in this regulation shall be construed to include any person, firm, association, or corporation, engaged in the brewing of alcoholic or nonalcoholic beer, ale, porter, or other cereal beverages.

2. That the term "brewery" shall be construed to mean any building, private or public, in which artificial heat is used to aid in the production of alcoholic or nonalcoholic beer, ale, porter, or other cereal beverages.

3. That no brewer as defined above, shall at any of his breweries consume, burn, or use fuel of any description, including coal, coke, natural gas, fuel oil, or other petroleum products, or use power derived from any such fuel, for or in connection with the brewing of either alcoholic or nonalcoholic cereal beverages, including beer, ale, porter, and beer substitutes, as above defined, during the year beginning July 1, 1918, and ending June 30, 1919, to an amount in excess of 50 per cent of the average annual output of the fuel consumed at such brewery during the period from January 1, 1915, to December 31, 1917.

4. That where it appears that any particular brewery was not in existence on January 1, 1915, then and in such case the period during which it has been in existence prior to January 1, 1918, shall be considered and used as a basis for determining the quantity of fuel that may be consumed under this regulation during the year beginning July 1, 1918.

5. That any brewer as above defined owning and operating more than one brewery for the brewing of alcoholic or nonalcoholic beer, ale, porter, or other cereal beverages, may combine such breweries and use in such combined brewery the fuel allotted to each of such breweries by this regulation, provided the total amount of fuel so used, at such combined brewery shall not be in excess of the amount of fuel permitted to be used by all of such breweries when operated separately.

6. That whenever two or more brewers find that a further fuel economy would result from using in one brewery the allotments of fuel as provided for by this regulation to two or more breweries, then, upon application to the United States Fuel Administration and upon receipt of a permit therefor, such brewers may use the aggregate allotments of fuel to their respective breweries at one or more breweries operated jointly by them, provided the amount of fuel so used shall not exceed the amount of fuel permitted to be used by all such breweries when operated separately.

7. That any such brewer, violating or refusing to conform to the above regulation, shall be liable to the penalty prescribed in the aforesaid act of Congress.

(Signed) H. A. GARFIELD,
United States Fuel Administrator.

CONFERENCE REPORT ON ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The SPEAKER. What was the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. STAFFORD. To have Senate amendment No. 123 read, as agreed to by the conferees, the time not to be taken out of the time in the control of the gentleman from Alabama.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that amendment No. 123, as agreed to by the conferees be read, the time not to be taken out of the time in the control of the gentleman from Alabama. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

CHAPTER XXIV.

CONDEMNATION OF PROPERTY FOR GENERATING ELECTRIC ENERGY.

That during the pendency of the present war, any person, association, or corporation, for the purpose of furnishing electric power to the United States or to persons, associations, or corporations engaged in the manufacture of ships, explosives, or munitions of war, or other articles and things for the use of the United States or its allies, upon compliance with the conditions hereinafter set forth, may institute proceedings in any district court of the United States or in any court of any State having jurisdiction of the property to be condemned, for the acquirement by condemnation of any land, the temporary use thereof, or other interest therein, or right pertaining thereto, required for the location or construction of any line or lines, or for the transmission of electric power for the operation of any plants which are or may be employed in the production of the articles and things hereinbefore mentioned: Provided, That nothing herein shall be construed to authorize the appropriation of any property already devoted to such use. That proceedings for the condemnation of property required for the generation and transmission of such electric power shall be prosecuted in accordance with the procedure prescribed for the condemnation of property in the State wherein the proceedings may be instituted.

SEC. 2. That before any person, association, or corporation, furnishing or to furnish electric power for the purposes mentioned in section 1 of this act, shall have the right to institute proceedings for condemnation, they shall submit to the Secretary of War a full and complete statement of the plan for furnishing power and the nature and extent of the easements or property which they desire to acquire under condemnation proceedings, for the purposes stated in the preceding section. If the Secretary of War approve such plan and finds that the construction or extension of such facilities for the generation or transmission of power and that the condemnation herein authorized is necessary to increase the supply of power for the objects and purposes stated in section 1 of this act, then such person, association, or corporation shall, upon the approval of such plan by the Secretary of War, have the right to construct, maintain, and operate the facilities described in such plan, and may cause proceedings to be instituted in any court having jurisdiction thereof for the acquirement by condemnation of any lands, the temporary use thereof, or other interest therein, or right pertaining thereto, as may be needed for the construction, maintenance, and operation of such facilities: Provided, That nothing in this section shall be construed as authorizing any rights in any public lands of the United States, or in any waters of the United States except such as may be necessary to build such transmission lines along or across said waters as may be approved by the Secretary of War: Provided further, That the Secretary of War may, prior to granting his approval as above set forth, require such person, association, or corporation to file with him a bond, in an amount and with a surety or sureties satisfactory to him, conditioned upon the prompt construction of the proposed facilities and the diligent maintenance and operation of the same to the satisfaction of the Secretary of War during the present war.

SEC. 3. That any person, association, or corporation having secured the approval of the Secretary of War and filed a petition for condemnation as herein provided may, upon filing with the court in which such petition is filed a bond to secure payment of just compensation to the owners of property taken, in a form and an amount and with a surety or sureties approved by said court after such notice and such hearing as the court may prescribe, have the right of immediate possession and use of such property or rights.

SEC. 4. That no plan for the construction or extension of any facilities shall be submitted to or approved by the Secretary of War hereunder after the existing state of war between the United States and its enemies shall have terminated, and the fact of such termination shall be ascertained and proclaimed by the President, but such termination of the existing state of war so ascertained and proclaimed shall not interfere with the condemnation of any land or other property or rights needed for the construction, maintenance, and operation of any facilities approved hereunder by the Secretary of War before such proclamation: Provided, however, That the Secretary of War may upon such termination of the existing state of war and prior to the entry of judgment in any condemnation proceeding hereunder and the commencement of construction or extension of the proposed facilities revoke any approval given hereunder to the plan for such proposed facilities: Provided further, That nothing in this chapter shall be construed as granting any franchise to utilize such facilities after the termination of the existing state of war.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD on the conference report.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. BORLAND). The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LAZARO. Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the chairman of the committee [Mr. DENT] to explain the difference between the conference report and the Senate on the medical amendment; that is, the amendment giving the medical men rank, and to state the opinion of the Surgeon General on this change.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, is it the purpose of the chairman of the committee to explain the important legislation that has been agreed to by the conferees, and which has not heretofore at any time been considered by the House?

Mr. DENT. I will state to the gentleman from Wisconsin that I have undertaken to make a very full and complete written statement of what was agreed to in the conference. Then I thought that if there were any provisions in the legislation that the conferees agreed to that any Member specifically wished to inquire about, that would be the most expeditious way of disposing of it. In other words, I do not see any reason why I should repeat on the floor of the House verbally a statement that has already been printed in the RECORD.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. DENT. Will the gentleman let me answer the question of the gentleman from Louisiana first?

Mr. STAFFORD. I just want to ask the gentleman this question: Does the gentleman consider that his explanation of Senate amendment 123, as embodied in the statement, is a full explanation of the powers conferred in that amendment?

Mr. DENT. No; there are several things in that statement that are not as full as might be desired.

Mr. STAFFORD. My request was to have those important matters given a fuller explanation by the chairman of the committee.

Mr. DENT. I will be very glad to do it in response to inquiry of any Member of the House who wants any fuller explanation of them.

The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. LAZARO] has asked me to explain the difference between the conference report and Senate amendment on No. 65, which provides for an increase in the medical department. The Senate amendment provided for an additional assistant surgeon general with the rank of major general, and for three assistant surgeon generals with the rank of brigadier general in the Regular Army. The conferees agreed on one additional major general only for service abroad during the war, and the conferees reduced the number of brigadier generals from three to two, so that there could be a brigadier general serving abroad.

In the next item the President was authorized by the Senate amendment to provide in the Medical Department of the National Army for four major generals and eight brigadier generals. The conferees reduced them to two major generals and four brigadier generals, with the understanding that this service should be divided at home and abroad.

The next provision is simply a repetition of the present law. In lines 11 to 15, page 61, of the Senate bill the conferees agreed to the Senate amendment, so that it would read as follows:

That the commissioned officers of the Medical Reserve Corps of the Regular Army, none of whom shall have rank above that of colonel, shall be proportionately distributed in the several grades as now provided by law for the Medical Corps of the Regular Army.

As it was in the Senate bill it provided the same number as there are in the Medical Corps of the Navy. This, as I am informed, practically reduces that number by something like one-half and under this act an officer of the Medical Reserve Corps may be promoted as high as the rank of colonel, whereas under the present law he can only go as high as major.

Mr. LAZARO. Will the chairman of the committee please state what the Surgeon General thinks of this modified amendment?

Mr. DENT. I have not consulted the Surgeon General as to what he thinks of the action of the conferees.

Mr. LAZARO. I mean in the interest of the service.

Mr. DENT. I will state to the gentleman from Louisiana that, while I have not consulted the Surgeon General as to the result of the compromise that was made in conference, the Surgeon General did tell me before any action was taken on it that the meat of this whole amendment lay in this paragraph between lines 11 and 15, on page 61, providing for the promotion of officers of the Medical Reserve Corps from major up to colonel; that that was the real meat of the whole proposition; and that was agreed to.

Mr. LAZARO. Will the gentleman permit me to make a short statement?

Mr. DENT. How many minutes would the gentleman like?

Mr. LAZARO. About two minutes.

Mr. DENT. I yield to the gentleman two minutes.

Mr. LAZARO. Mr. Speaker, I had hoped that the conferees would accept this Senate amendment to the Army bill. I felt that way because I knew it would be in the interest of the soldiers. We all know that the death rate in every war we have had has been high. In other words, Longmore's tables show that we have lost in every war we have had, with the exception of one, 80 men from disease where we have lost 20 from bullets. The only country that has reversed this death rate has been Japan. Japan sent her students all over the world to study the different systems, and as a result of that study they reorganized their system, they gave their medical men rank, and the result was that in the war between Japan and Russia there were over 52,000 men killed and only 11,000 died from disease. France, Italy, and Great Britain also have given their medical men rank.

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAZARO. Yes.

Mr. KAHN. Is the gentleman familiar with the figures of the American casualties in this war?

Mr. LAZARO. I have followed them very closely, and I believe we are doing well; but that does not alter the fact that if we would give our medical men rank, if we would give them a little more authority when it comes to questions of hygiene and sanitation in the camps, I am still of the opinion that we could do much better, and that is my reason for saying that the conferees ought to have accepted the Senate amendment.

Mr. KAHN. Is the gentleman aware of the fact that the provision as agreed to provides for an increase of rank in the Medical Corps up to the grade of colonel?

Mr. LAZARO. Yes; it is an improvement on what we had before. I merely said I had hoped that the conferees would accept the amendment as it was written at the other end of the Capitol; but, in view of the fact that they saw fit to modify it, and that I believe it is a step in the right direction and will tend to reduce the death rate in the Army and will improve the service, I am willing to abide by it.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER].

Mr. FOSTER. On the amendment adopted by the Senate, page 61, lines 16 to 22, inclusive, that was left out of the agreement by the conferees.

Mr. DENT. That was left out.

Mr. FOSTER. What was the reason they were not given these consulting physicians? This, as I understand, provided for a certain number of physicians that might be called in to serve as consulting physicians, that they might be there for a time and then go out. If I understand, there are many physicians in the United States who have been giving a large part of their time to the Government, giving up business and doing a great work along that line.

Mr. DENT. I will state to the gentleman from Illinois that that was stricken out because the conferees thought that in the Medical Corps of the Army it was not necessary to go out and make special contracts for employing civilian physicians, and they thought that under some circumstances it might be the subject of great abuse. We were informed that it was not necessary in view of the force in the Regular Establishment and the Reserve Corps.

Mr. FOSTER. There is allowed 7 physicians to 1,000 men?

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. And the gentleman states that is the only reason it was left out?

Mr. DENT. Really, the only purpose it could serve would be where the soldier happened to be separated from his force and there was no Regular Army physician present. That would be the only place in which it could operate; and, in view of the fact that it might be subject to great abuse, the conferees thought it ought to be stricken out.

Mr. FOSTER. It seems to me there are a good many men called into the service, and who have performed valuable services to the Government along this line. They are not put on the pay roll regularly, but go in at times when they could render great service to the Government, and practically at little cost.

Mr. DENT. I understand the Government has had no trouble on that score, physicians in civil life being perfectly willing to tender their services.

Mr. FOSTER. I think that is true; and yet I thought the Government ought to have the right under the circumstances to call these men in for that particular purpose.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. McCLINTIC. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on "Congressional service."

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. BORLAND). The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. LONDON. Reserving the right to object, I will ask the gentleman if he will repeat the offense committed by him in the Sixty-fourth Congress, when he used the right to extend remarks in the RECORD in an attack on the sole socialistic Member of Congress?

Mr. McCLINTIC. I will say that if the gentleman wishes to see the remarks before they are printed in the RECORD I will be glad to show them to him.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. EAGAN].

Mr. EAGAN. Mr. Speaker, I think the House should know of a circumstance brought to my attention this morning, and which I understand can not happen again if amendment numbered 101, proposed in the conference report, is adopted. Pvt. Henry C. Meyerdierks, of the Quartermaster Corps, a resident of North Bergen, N. J., and stationed at the Walter Reed Hospital, died at the hospital on June 13 last. About two weeks after that his father received a letter from his son's commanding officer giving an inventory of the private effects of his son, and in that letter occurs this statement:

"If any of the above articles are desired by you as mementoes, it will be necessary for you to purchase the same at a price fixed by the summary court."

I understand that the boy's commanding officer was required to send that letter in accordance with instructions from The Adjutant General of the Army, based on the One hundred and twelfth Article of War as enacted by the act of Congress August 29, 1916. The conference report shows that an amendment to the One hundred and twelfth article was passed by the Senate and adopted in conference, and I want to ask the gentleman from Alabama, the chairman of the committee, whether in his opinion that amendment will prevent a distressing incident like this occurring again.

Mr. DENT. I will state I think this amendment would cover a case of that kind. I did not know that the law was construed that strictly. I should have thought if a legal representative of the deceased soldier appeared within a reasonable time that he could secure the personal effects, but whether that be true or not this amendment to the law absolutely authorizes certain relatives of the soldiers to obtain, without the formality of any legal procedure or the payment of money, the personal effects of the soldier that were with him at the time of his death, and it names the order of priority of the relatives entitled to the same.

Mr. EAGAN. I felt that this statement should be made to the House, and I might add that I was assured by Pvt. Meyerdierks's commanding officer this morning that his private effects would be turned over to his father at once.

Mr. DENT. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. KAHN. Does not the gentleman understand that the purpose of the amendment is to allow the commanding officer to send the effects without any other formality by the next of kin?

Mr. DENT. Yes; and it names the order of the priority of the relatives receiving the same. I now yield to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the gentleman from Alabama concerning amendment 108, page 121, authorizing the President to commandeer timber and the equipment of logging plants. If I read this conference report correctly the conferees struck out the Senate amendment and inserted a new amendment authorizing condemnation proceedings for the Army and Navy of the United States. It says that condemnation proceedings are hereby conferred upon the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, and the chairman of the United States Shipping Board and the United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation, individually or collectively.

It also says:

Such right of condemnation shall be exercised by such officials only for the purpose of obtaining such property when needed for the production, manufacture, or building aircraft, dry docks, or vessels, their apparel or furniture, for housing of Government employees in connection with the Army, Navy, or the United States Shipping Board and the United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation, and for the procurement of materials and equipment for aircraft, dry docks, and vessels. The jurisdiction of such condemnation proceedings is hereby vested in the district courts of the United States where the property which is sought to be condemned, or any part thereof, is located or situated, regardless of the value of the same.

Does this mean the general commandeering in regard to logging lands or logging operations?

Mr. DENT. I do not know as I understand the import of the gentleman's question. It means simply that the Senate amendment authorized the President absolutely without any legal proceeding to take any standing or fallen timber in this country.

The owner was then relegated in his suit to whatever court he could get into, perhaps the Court of Claims. The conferees on the part of the House objected to that provision and insisted that in order to obtain possession of property for these purposes the Government ought to proceed by way of condemnation, as they had in other cases, and insisted on an amendment to the condemnation action passed last July, which is practically a war measure, authorizing the Government to take immediate possession upon the filing of a petition by the United States district attorney, but holding the case in court so that the man would have his day in court and get his rights.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. That is just it. I have here a copy of the bill, as I supposed, with the amendment showing in italic on page 121, amendment No. 108, and I do not find that provision for court procedure.

Mr. FIELDS. It is a new provision, inserted in conference.

Mr. DENT. It is an amendment of the condemnation act as passed July 2, 1917, and amended April 11, 1918, so that it is unnecessasy to repeat that in this amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I thank the gentleman for his statement, which makes it clear. I understand that timbermen generally in the State of Washington were quite willing to stand for straight commandeering as a war necessity. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD upon the commandeering sections of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. ANTHONY. Although I am a member of the gentleman's committee, there is such a mass of new legislation in this bill that I have not been able to digest it. I want to ask about the provision affecting contract surgeons.

Mr. DENT. What is the number of the amendment?

Mr. ANTHONY. It is the amendment which authorizes the placing of contract surgeons who have had 12 years or more of service upon the retired list should they fail to pass an examination for appointment into the Reserve Corps.

Mr. DENT. Has the gentleman from Kansas the number of that amendment before him?

Mr. ANTHONY. No; I have not the number; it is on page 21 of the report.

Mr. DENT. Yes. What is the gentleman's inquiry?

Mr. ANTHONY. Does the gentleman not think that it is a rather vicious piece of legislation to place a civil employee of the Government upon the retired list with the pay of an officer after 12 years of service?

Mr. DENT. I will say to the gentleman from Kansas that I am not willing to use language quite as severe as the word "vicious"; but as a general proposition I do not approve of legislation of this kind. The gentleman from Kansas knows, however, that these contract surgeons have been doing some remarkably good work for a long time. They have served in our foreign possessions; and the conferees on the part of the House, as the gentleman knows, can not insist upon everything; they have to make some compromises.

Mr. ANTHONY. I happen to remember that this same proposition has been before our committee a number of times.

Mr. DENT. So do I; and our committee has heretofore refused to yield upon it.

Mr. ANTHONY. And I was rather surprised to see it here in the bill.

Mr. DENT. There are only 25 of them.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think it is a very dangerous precedent for Congress to set—to take civil employees like contract surgeons, who have no status with the Government that requires such action as this, and place them upon the retired list with three-quarters pay of an officer of the Army. It seems to me it is going rather far.

Mr. DENT. I agree with the gentleman on the general proposition, but I do not think this particular thing is going to establish any precedent.

Mr. ANTHONY. The gentleman says that it puts 25 of them with this short service upon the retired list?

Mr. DENT. Oh, no; they must continue to serve. It puts only those on who fail to pass examination.

Mr. ANTHONY. It says they may pass examination for appointment as first lieutenants in the Reserve Corps; but if they fail to pass, and probably all of them will, because, as the gentleman says, they are over age and will not be able to pass the required examination, it means that they will go on the retired list.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. DEMPSEY. I am in receipt of a letter from France which says that the men in our Army do not receive their pay regularly; that they go as long as two months without receiving any pay whatever; that they have no means for defraying their ordinary expenses; and the writer of the letter to me draws a sharp contrast between the practice of our Army and the practice of the English Army. The English Army is paid regularly every week, and our men go as long as two months without any pay whatever. Does the chairman of the committee know anything about those conditions, and if he does, is anything being done to remedy them?

Mr. DENT. This is the first time I have had any information on the subject, and I would suggest to the gentleman, if that is true, that he should call it to the attention of the Secretary of War. I certainly should do so if I had information of that kind.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEMPSEY. Yes.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Did the gentleman's correspondent also call attention to the fact that we pay our soldiers five times as much as the English Army pays its soldiers?

Mr. DEMPSEY. It does not do any good to agree to pay five times as much if we do not pay it.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. We do pay it.

Mr. DEMPSEY. The thing to which I was calling attention was the fact that they do not get their pay. I was not contrasting the amount of pay, but I was contrasting the manner of pay. It is no answer to a contract to pay money to say that you have agreed to pay a large sum if you do not pay anything. If you have agreed to pay twice what you ought to pay and do not pay anything, that is no defense. It seems to me that the Committee on Military Affairs is the proper committee to inquire into this matter and see what the situation is, rather than some individual Member of Congress, and if such evil does exist it seems to me it ought to be remedied; that it is not a good answer to say on behalf of a member of the committee or the committee that we have agreed to pay large sums.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I will say to the gentleman I have had correspondence and contact with a good many soldiers, and the universal statement has been that they have no complaint as to pay and no complaint as to food, that we take the best care of them, and they consider their treatment by the Government in the Army the best and to be above reproach. That is my report, and this is the first complaint I have heard.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will the gentleman yield for a suggestion?

Mr. DEMPSEY. I will.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. It is very obvious, of course, from a glance at the map that the British Government might pay their troops very regularly and at short intervals, because there is only the distance of the channel to overcome. But the distance of 3,000 miles between this country and France is only our first handicap. The second proposition, which is even more important and complex, is that our men newly arrived are changed about from station to station in the Republic of France, and what is one post-office address to-morrow is a dead-letter office the day after.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Is not there the same change of quarters by the British troops at the front and are they not constantly changing their addresses?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I dare say, to some extent, but they are not in the immediate position now of sending their first troops in for the first time, as we are, and then sending them so frequently from one station to another in France, perhaps.

Mr. DEMPSEY. I think if that evil exists it should be remedied.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Unquestionably it can be, but two months is not a very long time.

Mr. DEMPSEY. It is quite a long time when the private soldier is going without any pay.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. It is a long time if conditions are normal, but when men have gone to war two months does not amount to very much where you have not the constant——

Mr. DEMPSEY. I should think it would seem longer in being away from all associations at home and unable to get from friends the things you want or else get money to get them.

In such condition I think two months away would be much longer than two months at home.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. The young man has always got his food, clothing, and quarters, and all things needed, regardless of his pocket money which the pay would supply. I do not think anybody is intending to withhold it from him. I can see, and I think the gentleman does, the decided physical disadvantages that could not always be easily regulated in distributing pay under war conditions outside of the distance of 3,000 miles.

Mr. DEMPSEY. I very readily——

Mr. DENT. I only yielded to the gentleman for a question.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the gentleman a question about the conference report, the pay question having been settled. Will the gentleman state what is the pressing necessity or emergency in reference to the industrial activities of the country which are supplying the war needs, to confer upon a person or corporation a right to acquire property or an easement for temporary use of a power plant or electric light corporation by eminent domain?

Mr. DENT. The gentleman from Massachusetts is well aware of the fact that the question of the construction of ships and the amount of explosives and munitions of war are two of the most important problems that the Government has to meet in this emergency and the War Department has submitted this matter to the Senate that this would aid the Government in the manufacture of ships and in obtaining explosives and munitions of war, surrounding the right to condemn with the provision that no private person or corporation should exercise this right until he or it had submitted to the Secretary of War the plan that they had in view, the amount that could be furnished to the Government, and have the approval of the Secretary of War before those proceedings could be instituted. The act further provides that nothing shall be considered as granting a franchise to utilize the facilities after the termination of the war. Now, I can not see that any harm can come from that, for it is practically and after all doing through the individual and corporation what the Government itself would have the right to do because the Secretary of War must authorize the institution of the proceedings before they can be instituted.

Mr. WALSH. Well, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. DENT. Yes, sir.

Mr. WALSH. This very bill itself commandeers; is authorized to take land by eminent domain. Where heretofore has the Government in any legislation conferred authority upon a private individual to go in and acquire a strip of land for the erection of a line of power wires or cables by eminent domain if that power is necessary in connection with Government activities, and I will say to the gentleman under the amendment proposed it is not confined to manufacturing of ships, explosives, or munitions of war, but any other articles or things for the use of the United States or their allies. Now, why should the precedent be established conferring that tremendous power, even though it may be approved by the Secretary of War, upon an individual or a corporation, or a combination of corporations for the purpose of furnishing electric power.

Mr. DENT. Well, I will state to the gentleman from Massachusetts, so far as I am informed, I know of no precedent by which Congress has authorized any such proceedings before, nor do I know of a precedent for a great many things that Congress has passed since this war was declared, but we are in war now and we are making precedents for the purpose of war.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. I will.

Mr. LONGWORTH. May I ask, at this point, would this provision authorize the corporation known as the "Air-Nitrate Corporation" to condemn land for the purpose of having wires to conduct electric power and carry it from the power plant to their plant?

Mr. DENT. Well, that is a legal proposition and I prefer not to express an opinion.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I rather suspect this provision was put in for that purpose mainly; however, I do not know about it.

Mr. DENT. I can not answer the gentleman about that.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman does not know the particular condition that this was designed to affect?

Mr. DENT. Not at all. I will make the further statement that the Senate conferees informed the conferees on the part of the House that this provision was carefully gone over by the Senator from Iowa, Mr. CUMMINS; the Senator from Wisconsin, Mr. LENROOT, formerly a Member of this House; and the Senator from Utah, Mr. KING, and that they all approve these provisions just exactly as the conference agreed to.

Mr. WALSH. Let them sign it if that be the case.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Is not the real purpose of this provision to enable the construction for the use of the Government of the United States and its activities, of power lines by private capital instead of compelling the Government in each instance, to do this as a Government activity?

Mr. DENT. Why, certainly.

Mr. DEMPSEY. And is not that all it means?

Mr. DENT. I suppose so.

Mr. DEMPSEY. In other words, the Government can do it itself if it wants to; but if it finds it more advantageous to do it through private channels it can do it in that way. That is the purpose of it, is it not?

Mr. DENT. That is the way I understand it.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. How very simple that proposition is, and how much language and white paper it took to express it in an amendment here by several sections. It goes further than that. It confers the right upon a British corporation to come in here with the approval of the Secretary of War and condemn land across a man's farm in order to erect a line of power cables; and they say they shall not have the right to utilize such facilities after the termination of the existing state of war; but it is provided that at the termination of the existing state of war, prior to the entry of judgment in any condemnation proceedings, and commencement of construction of extension of the proposed facilities, the Secretary of War may revoke it; but if it is not done prior to the entry of judgment, prior to the beginning of the construction of this line, it can not be revoked. And it seems to me that we might, particularly where in this very act we provide for the creation of an aircraft corporation in which the Government itself is to be a majority stockholder, provide that the Government should exercise this right instead of conferring the right to take land by eminent domain upon private parties. We all know that the electrical power development, or, rather, the creation and manufacture, requires large sums of money and consequently soon becomes centered in powerful corporations which radiate over and cover large sections of territory and extend over many States. And I believe that even though this is guarded by requiring the approval of the Secretary of War, we will find that before the war terminates and the problems incident to the termination of the war arise, we will have serious trouble if this power is to be conferred upon private individuals or private corporations. And it seems to me here is a problem that ought to have been brought to the House for consideration and the House given an opportunity to express itself on the question, as was suggested at the time this measure was sent to conference. On the other hand, we have amendments agreed to here by the conferees, and I know they have given careful thought to them; but the conference report was not printed until just shortly before the House convened, and we have had no opportunity to consider and discuss these matters. And the time will arrive when the hour will be up, and when we will have to vote this thing up or down. It seems to me on a proposition such as this there should have been opportunity for discussion and perhaps amendment.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. I suppose the gentleman from Alabama has yielded me all the time I can properly ask. I have expressed my views, but I do not care to trespass on the time of the committee further.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman from Alabama yield?

Mr. DENT. I yield.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I call the gentleman's attention to amendment 109, Aircraft Production Corporation, pages 124, 125, and 126, for the purpose of asking whether this carries an appropriation of $100,000,000 for the establishment of an aircraft production corporation that is to be in a measure independent of the Government?

Mr. DENT. For the purpose of asking whether it carries an appropriation of——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. One hundred million dollars. I wanted to get this in the RECORD, I will say to the gentleman. I ask if this amendment carries an appropriation of $100,000,000 for the purpose of establishing an Aircraft Production Corporation which will be independent of the Government?

Mr. DENT. Does the gentleman mean that this amendment No. 109 carries an additional amount of $100,000,000 to what has been appropriated in the bill?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. DENT. I think not. It simply authorizes the Government to subscribe the amount necessary.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. KAHN. This corporation will have the right to incorporate for $100,000,000. The lumber situation for making aircraft is rather peculiar. We supply all the spruce to all the cobelligerent nations. Great Britain takes one-half, France takes one-sixth, Italy takes one-eighth, and the United States takes one-quarter of the output. The gentlemen connected with the industry for the United States feel that this corporation ought to be organized and that each of the cobelligerent nations should put up debentures to this Government for the amount of lumber they are receiving from this Government, so that in the final analysis, when the day of settlement comes, the nations will get returns from their salvage in proportion to the stock that they are allotted in the corporation. The amount of the capital stock of the corporation is $100,000,000, but it is not proposed to appropriate any additional money for that purpose.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Well, the Government stands to put $100,000,000 into it for the Aircraft Production Corporation, does it not?

Mr. KAHN. It does stand to put in that much. The other nations will take much of the stock off the hands of this Government. Their allotment will be fixed by the Aircraft Production Board, and they will put up their bonds in the place of ours.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I want to get at that. We are going to form a corporation in the United States under the laws of the District of Columbia or some one of the States of the United States——

Mr. KAHN. I presume under the laws of the District of Columbia, or possibly under this law.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If necessary we are going to put into the corporation, out of the United States Treasury, as high as $100,000,000. That is the situation, is it not?

Mr. KAHN. I imagine that the foreign countries will put up three-fourths of the money by way of debentures, because they receive three-fourths of the product of the corporation.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I gather that we are going to stand for this corporation. I am glad to hear about these allies, but I would like to know who is the director of the Aircraft Production Corporation, upon whom the responsibility for the conduct of this corporation is to be placed?

Mr. KAHN. Mr. John D. Ryan, one of the leading business men of the country.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Let us get at that. This corporation is to be established with $100,000,000 of Treasury money, and Mr. John D. Ryan is to be the chairman or director of the corporation?

Mr. KAHN. I doubt if the money will be taken out of the Treasury of the United States, as I say.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If we pass this bill there will be $100,000,000 available for Mr. John D. Ryan to draw upon for the purposes of the corporation.

Mr. KAHN. It may be possible that, in order to get speedy action before the other countries can put up their debentures for the amount of stuff they will require, we will have to advance it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is an explanation I want. But I observe, in section 2, the Director of Aircraft Production, who is to be Mr. John D. Ryan, "may, for and on behalf of the United States, subscribe, purchase, and vote not less than a majority of the controlling capital stock of such corporation"; and a little further on comes this rather unusual paragraph, and one as to which I would like to have an explanation, "and, with the approval of the Secretary of War, may sell any or all of the stock, bonds, notes, debentures, or other securities of the United States in such corporation." Where are the proceeds to go?

Mr. KAHN. That authorizes him to sell to foreign countries.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will read the proviso, because I want to get this thing clear. The only provision here is——

Mr. DENT. On what page is the gentleman reading?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Page 125. He has the right to purchase and vote.

Mr. DEMPSEY. He is required to.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes. That is stronger. I suppose as legislators we ought to know what we are doing in creating a $100,000,000 corporation and turning over the entire thing to Mr. John D. Ryan. Now, read line 19. He has the power, "and, with the approval of the Secretary of War, he may sell any or all of the stocks, bonds, notes, debentures, or other securities of the United States in such corporation: Provided, That at no time shall the United States be a minority holder of voting stock therein." I read your proviso, and ask you or any other gentleman, what becomes of the proceeds of the sale of the stock that Mr. John D. Ryan is authorized to sell? Where is there any provision in the bill providing for that?

Mr. DENT. Naturally the place the proceeds would go would be into the Treasury.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It does not say so.

Mr. DENT. It follows as a matter of course and as a matter of law.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I do not think it follows as a matter of course.

Mr. DENT. The gentleman from Pennsylvania will not dispute the proposition that whenever any Government property is sold under authority of law the proceeds must be covered into the Treasury.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield for a moment further?

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The only provision I see for the disposition of the proceeds of the sale of the stock is on page 126, where it reads, "Upon the dissolution of the corporation or corporations the same shall be liquidated and the assets distributed in accordance with the laws of the District of Columbia or the State or States under which such corporation or corporations are organized." What becomes of the United States' holdings under those circumstances?

Mr. DENT. I will state to the gentleman that I can not answer him any further than by the statement I have already made, and that is that it seems to me that under general law whenever any Government property is sold under authority of law the proceeds must be covered into the Public Treasury. That is a matter of general law, and it is not necessary to put it in this legislation.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is modified to a certain extent by the provision that the money shall be distributed in accordance with the laws of the District of Columbia or the States.

Mr. DENT. No. I differ from the gentleman about that. I construe that to mean that that distribution shall be made to the stockholders and not the Government of the United States as a stockholder. That is the method of providing for distribution to the stockholders, other than the Government.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me about three minutes?

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I left?

The SPEAKER. Twelve minutes.

Mr. DENT. I yield to the gentleman from Wyoming four minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming is recognized for four minutes.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I have no desire to criticize the conferees on the part of the House on the Army appropriation bill. I think, as a matter of fact, that under the circumstances and conditions they did excellently well. They certainly made an earnest effort to carry out the will of the House relative to the amendments of the Senate, and they have been to a very considerable extent successful in accomplishing that. Yet the fact remains that the conference report contains a very considerable amount of undigested, comparatively little understood, and doubtful legislation. It is a very unfortunate commentary on our methods of procedure here, and it ought to be a lesson to this House to more earnestly insist than the House has been doing in the recent past upon keeping legislative provisions off of appropriation bills.

There are provisions added to this bill in the Senate that had not been considered by Senate committees, provisions that were only briefly discussed on the floor of the Senate, never presented to a committee of the House, never considered by the House. This was the situation: A bill carrying vast appropriations absolutely essential to the conduct of the war, loaded down in the Senate with all sorts of questionable provisions, and the House conferees compelled either to withhold from the Army its necessary funds or to accept some of these propositions, in regard to which I have no doubt they had very serious questionings and doubts.

I do not know just how we are to cure this increasing tendency of another body to insist on legislating in conference, but there ought to be some way to accomplish that result. The condition of war, coupled with the fact that the appropriation bills were considered late in the session and had not been agreed upon at the beginning of the new fiscal year, has been taken advantage of by the other legislative body of the Congress to compel the House, through its conferees, to accept much in the way of legislation which, in my opinion, the House would not consider favorably if presented in the usual way to the House committees. As I said at the beginning, I do not criticize the conferees. I think, under the circumstances, they have done remarkably well. But there is no sort of question but that in time to come some of the provisions added to this bill in conference to-day will rise up to plague us.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Tulley, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 11283) to amend and reenact sections 4, 11, 16, 19, and 22 of the act approved December 23, 1913, and known as the Federal reserve act, and sections 5208 and 5209, Revised Statutes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. OWEN, Mr. HITCHCOCK, and Mr. MCLEAN as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the House agree to the conference asked for by the Senate on the District of Columbia appropriation bill (H. R. 11692). I think it can be done by unanimous consent and will take only a moment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent that the House agree to the conference asked for by the Senate on the District of Columbia appropriation bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection; and the Speaker appointed as conferees on the part of the House Mr. SISSON, Mr. MCANDREWS, and Mr. DAVIS.

ARMY APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, proceeding again with the consideration of the conference report on the Army bill, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT] be extended one hour.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT] be extended one hour in addition to the hour he has. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Alabama yield?

Mr. DENT. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. STAFFORD. I notice that the Senate took advantage of existing conditions by incorporating another separate bill as a Senate amendment to the Army appropriation bill, providing for an interdepartmental social hygiene board. This relates to the control of venereal diseases on the part of the National Government. Many of us, I suppose, have received letters in behalf of this bill. I believe it establishes for the first time the policy of the National Government giving consideration to health matters that are purely local in the States, and appropriates $1,400,000 for two years in succession. Will the gentleman inform the House what was the exigent condition that caused the Senate conferees to insist on this separate bill to be incorporated in the appropriation bill?

Mr. DENT. The statement made to the conferees was that this situation throughout the country was so serious that it was necessary for the Government to coordinate with the States in order to try to stamp out these diseases from civil life, because of the fact that most of the trouble on account of these diseases in the Army is caused by those who are coming in from civil life under the draft. Of course, this is in line with legislation that has heretofore been adopted by Congress, appropriating so much money on condition that the States would appropriate a similar amount, the jurisdiction to control the matter being left with the States. I will state to the gentleman from Wisconsin for his own satisfaction that I was inclined very much to agree with his views, and stood out just as long as I could, but we had to have an appropriation bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. In my own State at a recent special session of the legislature we increased the authority of the respective health officers to control these diseases which are the result of sexual vice, and I believe other States are following the same line; but here we have for the first time a policy of the National Government going into the control of health matters. Of course all of us who have any acquaintance with life know of the ravages of venereal diseases. In prior legislation we have authorized the Government to establish vice zones around the cantonments and camps, and I believe in this bill there is a provision to which the House conferees agreed, forbidding portable houses or conveyances of ill fame within a certain radius of camps and cantonments, to provide against evils to which attention has been called in some of the large cities, where automobiles have been utilized for purposes of prostitution.

If we launch into this policy, so far as the control of venereal diseases are concerned, it is a warrant for our launching a policy for the control of tubercular troubles and every other character of disease. I recognize that some good will come from it; but when the States are going ahead so rapidly on their own initiative to control this condition, whether we should take supervisory control is a question that must be determined by Congress. We have done something in the control of diseases of cattle and horses and other domestic animals, and that policy can be used strongly as an example warranting this legislation. If we spend millions of dollars for the control of dourene and other diseases of horses and cattle, of course we are justified in spending millions or tens of millions of dollars for the eradication of diseases that are so fatal to the offspring of the human species.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, will my colleague yield?

Mr. DENT. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. KAHN. The Committee on Military Affairs have been informed by the War Council that in the National Army—the boys who are drafted and who come right from the homes of the Nation—there are 273 out of every 1,000 infected with venereal disease. Those are official figures from the War Department, and that discloses an appalling condition of affairs in this country. It well behooves the Government to cooperate with the States in stamping out this curse of the human race. Cases of smallpox, bubonic plague, diphtheria, and scarlet fever must be reported to the local health authorities immediately, and the country, the States, and the municipalities seek to regulate and prevent the spread of those diseases; but through prudery and mawkish sentimentality we have closed our eyes to the serious condition that exists in our country by reason of the prevalence of venereal diseases. I contend, therefore, that this legislation is a step in the right direction, and that every father and mother in this country will approve of the action of the Congress in establishing this board of social hygiene.

Mr. WALDOW. Mr. Speaker, I notice that the amendment in relation to the Aircraft Production Corporation provides for the purchase, production, and manufacture of aircraft.

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. WALDOW. Does the gentleman know if this corporation contemplates the purchase of any existing plants that are now manufacturing aircraft?

Mr. KAHN. I do not. I rather imagine that they will do something in that direction; but, of course, we are in a condition where we need aircraft. We want to procure them wherever we can get them, and we want them speedily. I rather imagine that the Government will be anxious to cooperate with all the existing plants, and will endeavor to provide any additional ones that may be needed to give us aeroplanes in such numbers as may be required for the winning of this war.

Mr. WALDOW. I agree with what the gentleman says, but from his statement a short time ago I took it that this Aircraft Production Corporation was only going to secure the necessary spruce. I was wondering how far their duties might go.

Mr. KAHN. That will be only one of their activities. Of course in the production of aircraft we have had an unfortunate condition in this country. Before we got into the war, and although the flying machine was first invented in this country, the other nations got way ahead of us. When we entered the war we had practically no airplanes and no facilities for producing them. Relying on the promises of producers and the optimism of producers the announcement was made by the War Department officials and the Signal Corps men that within a year we would have 22,000 airplanes. Unfortunately the tentative program has fallen down. I do not blame the men who made the announcement. They did not know the difficulties of the situation themselves. The purpose of this Aircraft Production Board is to stimulate the production of everything that will go into the manufacture of aeroplanes. The idea is to make all the countries who will be the beneficiaries of that production put up their share of the amount that will be required to produce these things. Their Governments will put up their debentures, so that when the war is over and they have a certain amount of salvage on hand the entire matter will be settled in a straightforward businesslike way without any hitches and without any bitter feeling, because each stockholding country will be entitled to its proportionate share of the proceeds of the assets of the corporation when the war is over.

Mr. WALDOW. I thank the gentleman for his explanation. I was greatly interested in the subject, as the Curtis airplane plant in Buffalo is located in my district.

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. KNUTSON. I had a letter a short time ago from an aeroplane construction company located in the Northwest, wherein they said that they had been unable to interest the War Department in their plant or to secure contracts in any way, shape, or form. They had offered to turn their plant over to the Government. They were under the impression that the War Department was favoring the Curtis and Wright plane companies to the exclusion of others. Can the gentleman give any information upon that point?

Mr. KAHN. I do not think there is a word of foundation for that assertion. I believe the Aircraft Production Board is doing its best to stimulate the plants all over the country that are in successful production of aeroplanes.

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman further yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. KNUTSON. What became of the $640,000,000 that this Congress provided last year?

Mr. KAHN. The gentleman is a little behind the time. When this bill was brought up originally in the House in May this matter was explained in full, and every dollar of that appropriation was accounted for. If the gentleman will just turn back to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, he will see that although we did appropriate $640,000,000 the great portion of the money had not then been expended.

Mr. KNUTSON. What was the idea of coming before Congress and asking a further appropriation if that money had not been expended?

Mr. KAHN. It had been obligated. I want to say to the gentleman that, of course, all that money was not utilized in the purchase of aeroplanes. The department had to purchase land in many parts of the country; they had to have land for the purpose of establishing camps for the training of the men; they had to establish flying fields; they had to lease a great many tracts of land; they had to buy many things that were required for the successful production of machines; they had to build hangars for machines; they had to put up barracks for the men who are being taught how to fly, and all that required large sums of money.

Mr. KNUTSON. Six hundred and forty million dollars represents 64 cents for every minute since the birth of Christ.

Mr. KAHN. Well, I do not catch the application of the gentleman's remarks. I am not a lightning calculator and don't know whether his figures are correct.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I asked some questions about the aircraft production during the consideration of the bill carrying the appropriation of $640,000,000. I have heard the gentleman's explanation of it. The gentleman knows that there is an inquiry going on in regard to the expenditure of that $640,000,000, and that the President has appointed Charles E. Hughes as chief examiner of the charges made. As one Member of Congress who voted for that appropriation, I have not been entirely satisfied that we were getting a full return for the expenditures made. I voted on the assurance of the gentleman from California that the War Department demand for aeroplanes was urgent. I wanted to hasten this matter. As a patriotic Representative I wanted to see results come from the expenditure of so large a sum as $640,000,000. That is the reason I have made inquiries and why other inquiries are now being made as to this Aircraft Production Corporation appropriation of $100,000,000 additional.

Mr. KAHN. The Aircraft Production Board will be practically the same kind of a board as the Emergency Fleet Corporation. Its functions will be the same as to the production of airplanes as the Emergency Fleet Corporation's in regard to the building of ships.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. There have been some rumors in regard to the Emergency Fleet Corporation.

Mr. KAHN. And they are being investigated.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. But they are turning out ships now, and we are getting results. Are we getting results in aeroplanes? The gentleman may be able to say something on that subject which will be illuminating.

Mr. KAHN. I want to say to the gentleman that, in my opinion, the aircraft production at the present time is going along exceedingly satisfactorily.

Mr. DENT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. DENT. I placed in the RECORD on Wednesday a letter from the Secretary of War showing what had been accomplished within the past 12 months, and among other things is the statement that for the week ending the 15th of June the Government had reached the production of 80 planes delivered that week, and the statement was made that the production in the future from now on would be as many as they anticipated.

Mr. WALDOW. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman state whether those were battle planes.

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. DENT. Combat planes.

Mr. KAHN. That is the number that are being produced in the United States. We are producing some on the other side also, so that we are getting considerably more per week than the gentleman from Alabama has stated.

Mr. GILLETT. If the gentleman will allow me to state, with reluctance, the gentleman's statement that we are doing satisfactorily is exactly what the Secretary of War told our committee last January—that our plane production was going very satisfactorily. I have no doubt that he was deceived. I hope the gentleman is not as much deceived as he was.

Mr. KAHN. There are two factors that go into the manufacture of aeroplanes, the plane itself and the motor. The motor is more important than the plane. A great deal of the delay in this country was due to the difficulty we had in getting a satisfactory motor. Some of us think it might have been advisable for the Government to accept those motors that were in use in England and France and that had proven satisfactory at the time we got into this war. The then head of the Signal Corps, however, and other gentlemen interested felt that we ought to develop our own motor, which would be much simpler than the other motors used by foreign countries, a motor that could be standardized and that would produce greater power than the other motors. There was considerable difficulty about it. After testing the so-called Liberty motor they found certain defects, structural defects, and it required many weeks to remedy those defects. In the meantime valuable time was slipping away. It was unfortunate, but at the present time the Liberty motor has demonstrated its value.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. It is a fact, is it not, that the Liberty motor has been abandoned as a motor for battle planes proper—the small, actual fighting planes?

Mr. KAHN. It has not been abandoned for the large combat planes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I am referring to the actual, small fighting planes. That is the fact, is it not?

Mr. KAHN. I am not advised as to that. The Liberty motor is a 12-cylinder motor. It is too powerful, in my opinion, for the smaller planes. I rather think that the Government is now buying or having manufactured for its use the Hispano-Suiza, the Bugati, and several others.

Mr. LONGWORTH. My information, which is not as official as the gentleman's, is that the Liberty motor has proven a conspicuous success in so far as the large bombing planes are concerned.

Mr. KAHN. Also the observation planes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. And the observation planes, but that it has practically been abandoned, as it has not been considered advisable for the small fighting planes.

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. CRAGO. And the testimony before our committee was that they had never intended to use it in those lighter planes.

Mr. KAHN. That is true.

Mr. GILLETT. It did not start as a 12-cylinder motor, did it?

Mr. CRAGO. The testimony was that it was never thought that it would be successful for the small planes.

Mr. GILLETT. When it started as a 6 or an 8 cylinder it was thought it would be.

Mr. CRAGO. Yes.

Mr. KAHN. Yes; that is probably true, but they had not developed it to a 12-cylinder motor. It has proven so successful that England and France have placed large orders for them with our country and we are now supplying those countries with the Liberty motor.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I do not want to interrupt the statements in respect to the Liberty motor, but the matter of aircraft and air program is something that has been passed upon.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, I merely want to suggest that in conversation with the president of the Wright company at Dayton, he said that up to June 22 they had shipped 421 battleplanes and were capable of producing them in great quantities, but the reason they had not done so was that there had been a good many changes made, and they had not yet gotten into the real process of production.

Mr. KAHN. It is going forward now with increasing rapidity every week.

Mr. FESS. He told me that there were 36 carloads shipped on one day out of Dayton.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, it is true that the conferees agreed to a great many matters of legislation that were put in the bill by the Senate as Senate amendments. Most of the amendments that were put on were amendments that the Military Committee of the House had heretofore considered. I suggested to the House the other day, and I repeat it now, that as there were certain legislative matters that ought to be adopted before Congress took a recess, I was perfectly willing for the Senate to put upon the Army appropriation bill such legislative matters as the War Department insisted upon and as the two committees of the two Houses of Congress were practically agreed upon.

In response to that suggestion the chairman of the Senate Military Affairs Committee invited the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] and myself to meet with him and the ranking minority member of the Senate Committee on Military Affairs and Gen. Crowder and certain representatives of his office. We went over most of this legislation. We went particularly into the amendments providing for changes in the national-defense act and had a complete understanding as to each one of them. I do not think that there could be any objection to any of that legislation. It is true that in addition to some of the measures that the War Department wanted the Senate adopted legislation either by suggestion of the committee or on the floor of the Senate. Some of them the conferees agreed to and others we disagreed to.

I wish to state that the conferees went into conference on Monday afternoon; that on that afternoon we agreed upon the money items in the bill, and that we spent from that time until Friday afternoon ferreting out different legislative features that had been put on the bill.

I do not think that there is anything of consequence that the conferees finally agreed upon that was placed upon the bill as new legislative matter that any serious objection can be made to. Now, I wish to make this statement and then I shall be through, unless some Members desire to ask me some further questions about the bill. There was in the bill a provision with regard to the appointment of two additional major generals of the line and one lieutenant general. That provision was compromised in the conference by providing for the two major generals and cutting out the provision for the lieutenant general.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman let me finish my statement, and then I will yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The agreement made by the conferees as to the major generals was made at the earnest insistence of the Secretary of War because of the peculiar attitude in which the present Chief of Ordnance and the present Chief of the Quartermaster's Department are placed. They both now have the rank of major general. They can be retired by the President to-day as major generals. They can be retired as major generals upon their own personal request. They do not desire to ask that. The department does not desire to ask them to retire with that rank, and the department is using both of those men in the performance of valuable service for the Government. One of them is connected with the War Council, after having spent some months in France studying the ordnance situation over there, and the other is in command of the Southeastern Department at Charleston, S. C. If this bill is not passed the officers occupying these positions will either have to retire by request on the part of the President or upon their own personal request or they will have to serve out their term, which expires some time next February, I believe it is, and one of them will absolutely, after serving for many years, be relegated entirely to private life.

I did not want to agree in those provisions, and I had a conference with the Secretary of War, and I was accompanied in that conference by the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN], and the Secretary of War requested that we adopt this provision so there would be no trouble about these two cases, and for that reason the House conferees agreed on the provision authorizing the retirement now or when they reached the retiring age as major general with the rank they now hold. The other provision in the amendment, put on on the floor of the Senate, authorized the appointment of Gen. Crowder as lieutenant general of the Army. There was some difference of opinion upon the subject, but no action was taken by the conferees upon the item in the bill until Gen. Crowder sent to the chairman of the Military Committee of the Senate and to myself, as the chairman of the House Committee on Military Affairs, a letter in which he asked that that provision be stricken out of the bill. Whatever differences of opinion we may entertain as to the policy pursued by the Judge Advocate General acting as Provost Marshal General, we all must concede that his administration of the draft law has been a success, I will say, even far beyond the expectations of the most earnest advocates of the draft system. [Applause.] And to-day I desire as a part of my remarks to have read from the desk and to be printed in the RECORD the magnanimous letter which he has written, in which he says that he does not desire that any special favoritism should be shown to him at this time. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the letter.

The Clerk read as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE PROVOST MARSHAL GENERAL,
Washington, July 5, 1918.

Hon. S. HUBERT DENT, Jr.,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. DENT: In view of that provision of the Army appropriation bill, personal to myself, now pending before the conference committee, it is unavoidable that I should take this opportunity to lay before you and also Senator CHAMBERLAIN, chairman of the Senate conferees, my personal sentiments and to ask you to communicate them, if you see fit, to your associates.

That the provision in question involves a compliment and a distinction which I value beyond anything in my military career is natural, and that the approval testified to by the vote of the Senate gratifies me beyond the power of words to express is a simple statement of fact.

But, after considerable reflection and viewing the matter in a broad way, I am reluctant to allow the consideration of the proposed proviso to proceed any further. If the conferees are in accord with my wishes in this regard, I should be glad if you, for the House conferees, and Senator CHAMBERLAIN for the Senate conferees, in reporting back to your respective Houses that the Senate conferees yielded on this provision, would say that the action was in accord with my request and for the express reason next to be stated.

Forty-eight States and three Territorial headquarters and nearly 6,000 local and district boards, with an aggregate membership of nearly 18,000 citizens, assisted by legal and medical advisory boards in every jurisdiction, have cooperated with the national headquarters efficiently and honorably, and many without compensation, in the superb teamwork which has produced the gratifying results attained under the selective service law. These results embrace the registration of more than ten and one-half millions of citizens and their classification for military service and the entrainment of the nearly 1,600,000 men now serving with the colors. By August 1 of this year this latter number will be approximately 2,000,000, and by the close of the year, if expected requisitions are received, the aggregate will approach 3,000,000. Of the members of these boards it may be truly said that when the selective service system which they administer ceases to function efficiently to produce the military and to conserve the industrial man power we shall be in a fair way to lose this war. I have long entertained the view that something ought to be done to recognize publicly and emphatically the enormous sacrifices these citizens have made in bestowing the continuous and exhausting service that has been indispensable in carrying the administrative burden of the selective service system. The difficulty has been in devising a suitable reward, nation wide in its application, and acceptable generally to those who have so participated. At the risk of being regarded as ungrateful to the proposers of this provision I can not bring myself to be satisfied that my own conscientiously performed share in discharging that duty should become the subject of recognition so long as the far greater share of these other builders of the National Army remains without public and distinguished acknowledgment in the records of Congress.

These men, my fellow workers, their toils, their sacrifices, and their achievements, are next to my heart. On this subject I frankly confess to a deep sentiment—I hope that it will not be reckoned as sentimentality—a sentiment which would not receive unalloyed satisfaction from the bestowal of any honor, however generous, that is personal to myself only.

In placing before you at this time these sincere convictions, I trust that I have adequately expressed the motive that prompted this letter.

Cordially and gratefully, yours,

E. H. CROWDER,
Provost Marshal General.

[Applause.]

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND].

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, I want to take this opportunity to pay my compliments to Gen. Crowder for the dignified decision that he has made by this letter. When the selective-service law was before the House I supported it earnestly. I regarded it as one of the greatest pieces of legislation that any nation had ever undertaken. I regarded it as the most remarkable piece of legislation in preparation for a war that was ever proposed or carried out by any country. The success of that legislation rested not entirely upon the wisdom of its construction, but rested, of course, fundamentally and ultimately upon the wisdom of its enforcement, and I think that we have been peculiarly fortunate that the administration of that great law, so nearly affecting the destiny of millions of American citizens and American homes, fell into the hands of a man who was big enough to handle that big proposition. We all admit that Gen. Crowder's handling of that selective-draft law has been the most remarkable success in our war preparation. We have heard criticism all down the line of other things relating to our preparedness, but apparently there has been almost a unanimous acquiescence in the proposition that the handling of the selective-draft law has exceeded the fondest expectations of those who supported the law. I believe that has been due in large measure to the splendid services and military knowledge of Gen. Crowder. [Applause.] I believe it has been due also to the remarkable spirit of cooperation which has been shown by the local draft boards. I am free to say without invidious comparison that there is not a nation in the world that could have put the administration of such a law affecting the destiny of its citizens into the hands of local boards composed of provincial officials in every quarter of the country. No nation would have attempted it, and yet this Nation, which less than a lifetime ago emerged from the most bitter civil strife, has seen fit to put it into the hands of local officials in every quarter of our land to administer a law vital to the national life. The administration that has been carried on by those local boards, the loyalty, the patriotism, and self-sacrifice that they have shown is beyond praise. I think that the cooperation between Gen. Crowder and those local boards and the interest which he has inspired in the local boards, and the spirit which he has put into them in the administration of the law has been a wonderful factor in the success of the preparedness and in the making of this great National Army for the defense of this country. He deserves and he has received from the American people a meed of praise for this work, which will crystallize into enduring fame. His contribution to the winning of this war has been substantial and will fix his place in the affections of the Nation as one of the great constructive figures of this national crisis.

I should have been glad on the floor of this House to have voted for what I believe is a well-deserved honor to Gen. Crowder, but I believe he has taken a big decision in refusing to permit any appearance of such individual partiality on the part of Congress toward himself. I think sometimes we set an undue importance upon the mere question of rank. But as that great poet of my own race, "Bobbie" Burns, says:

> The rank is but the guinea's stamp,
> The man's the gowd for a' that.

[Applause.]

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, I wish to ask the chairman of the committee some questions about this section, Chapter XXVI, page 148, of the bill, being amendment 123, which authorizes any person, association, or corporation to acquire by condemnation any lands, interests, or rights for the purpose of furnishing electric power to the United States or persons or corporations engaged in manufacturing ships, explosives, or munitions of war during the war.

Now, that section was adverted to by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] a little while ago, and it has been put in by the committee without any consideration by this House, and I presume that nothing I would say would have any effect upon it. But I want to call the attention of the gentleman in charge of this bill to what seems to me to be a very dangerous power contained in this section. I will admit we ought to grant to the President and to the Government every war power that is necessary in order to prepare our country for war and wage it to success, and I have voted that way since this Congress convened in extraordinary session, and I propose to continue to so vote. But here is a proposition that proposes to endow individuals, whether they are citizens of the United States or of our allied nations, with the power of eminent domain, and it proposes to clothe them with the power to go into any State and condemn land and property rights and facilities to be used in the manufacture of ammunition or other supplies for the war.

Now, the only restriction on that extraordinary power, Mr. Chairman, is found in the provision, page 149, line 14, that it must be first submitted to and "receive the approval of the Secretary of War." Then, the other restriction is that any condemnation proceedings must be "according to the proceedings in the State where the land is located." It is worthy of note at this point that in Pennsylvania, the State from which I come, no individual enjoys the right of eminent domain. There is only one case in which an individual can take property, and that is where he owns a coal mine, quarry, or mineral deposit. Then under certain conditions he can take a right of way leading out to a public highway, a navigable stream, or a railway, but only an easement as a right of ingress or egress to such mine or quarry and under no other circumstances. And we propose here under an act of Congress to endow an individual with this high sovereign right which the supreme law of the State withholds from its own citizens.

Mr. DENT. Will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. ROBBINS. Yes.

Mr. DENT. I thought the gentleman wanted to ask a question. Does the gentleman want some time?

Mr. ROBBINS. I would like some time.

Mr. DENT. I would like to fix a time.

Mr. ROBBINS. Let me suggest to the gentleman that we are going to be in session until a report comes back from the White House about our taking a recess at half past 4, and we can well employ the time considering this bill.

Mr. DENT. I do not intend to cut the gentleman off, but how much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. ROBBINS. Give me five minutes.

Mr. DENT. I yield to the gentleman five minutes.

Mr. ROBBINS. As I stated, this gives the individual a right, and an alien, too, that is not given to our own citizens under the law of Pennsylvania to go in and condemn property, either public or private, without restriction. This right ought to be circumscribed and limited, I think. First, the right of eminent domain can not be conferred upon a corporation in Pennsylvania to take the dwelling house of an individual that is in his actual possession and occupancy of the owner or take a church or graveyard. We propose here, without any limitation to confer eminent domain rights, not only upon corporations, but upon an individual. That sort of an act of Congress, of course, would be a nullity in Pennsylvania, against the specific reservations contained in our constitution, and against the constitutional provisions of the United States and the laws enacted thereunder.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBBINS. Yes.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Is not the real purpose of the conferring of the right of eminent domain dependent not upon whether it is conferred upon a corporation or an individual, but upon the purpose for which it is conveyed, whether it is granted for a public purpose, a purpose which would serve the public, or whether it is granted for a private purpose?

Mr. ROBBINS. No.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Is not that the real basis of it?

Mr. ROBBINS. That is not the law.

Mr. DEMPSEY. I know it is not the law, but is not that the purpose?

Mr. ROBBINS. My time is limited. I will give you some time afterwards, if you will permit. The right of eminent domain is one of the strictest rights given to a corporation. Old Judge Black has laid down this proposition in a case in Pennsylvania that is quoted in all jurisdictions. "When the power of eminent domain is claimed those asserting the claim must point to the specific language containing the grant; in the absence of such, the power does not exist."

Now, here is the situation that alarms me about this extraordinary provision in this act. In western Pennsylvania we have three large public-service corporations manufacturing electricity and selling it for light, heat, and power. One that is located in my part of the State serves municipalities, street railways, coal mines, and all manner of corporations and individuals consuming either light, heat, and power. Under this provision, this extraordinary provision, it is proposed, with the approval of the Secretary of War, that a foreigner—French, English, or Italian, belonging to our allies—could come out there and take away the power from our coal mines or our municipalities or our street railways and paralyze and disorganize the whole industrial situation in western Pennsylvania? If that is the purpose of this bill, then, I assert, it is conferring a power that we ought not to confer, because the injury by its exercise would be greater than any benefits we would derive by giving such extraordinary power to the Government or to individuals or corporations who wish the right to make power or to manufacture munitions. This can be accomplished in conformity to law better than against the law.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. In each instance, if it should be a foreigner or ally, the application must have the approval of the Secretary of War.

Mr. ROBBINS. That is the only restriction, that and the fact that he must go into the local courts to condemn land. But I contend for us to confer such extraordinary, unlimited power is wrong.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. It does not confer it. It simply appoints a more restricted agency, that is to determine whether he is to have it or not and for what purpose, and that purpose, as set down here, is a war purpose.

Mr. ROBBINS. But war purposes means in this Congress any purpose directly or indirectly connected with the preparation for war. And the Secretary of War would not know the disastrous result that would follow the shutting down of the West Penn Electric Power, for instance, in western Pennsylvania, that operates coal mines and street railways and public utilities of every sort as well as furnishes light to many thousand homes and many schools and churches.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Have we not day after day put in his hands power more extensive in possibilities than that?

Mr. ROBBINS. There is no exercise of power that would be fraught with such disaster as the full exercise of this power would be.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBBINS. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Where does the gentleman find in the bill the authority to do what the gentleman states—to take away the facilities for creating power? This is a provision, as I understand it, simply for the condemnation of the location of a plant.

Mr. ROBBINS. It is not the condemnation of a location. It is the condemnation of facilities, also, as you will see in line 21 of page 148. The word "power" is stricken out and the words "lines of transmission" are inserted on page 149.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. It is "for the acquirement by condemnation of any land, the temporary use thereof, or other interests therein, or right pertaining thereto, for the location or construction of any power plant."

Mr. ROBBINS. The words "power plant" are stricken out of the corrected copy of the bill we are now considering.

The SPEAKER pro tempore [Mr. DICKINSON]. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. ROBBINS. You will find the facilities described in line 22 of page 149. I would like an explanation of the section, because, if it means all this, we ought not to adopt it in its present form. I favor the granting of the authority here requested, but think proper constitutional safeguards should be still preserved about the provisions of the act which grants the rights.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I have endeavored to explain the situation. I have had several inquiries about it, and I have endeavored to explain it as well as I could, and, in brief, I have stated that no private party or corporation could institute such proceedings until the Secretary of War was informed of the purpose they had in view, and what they could accomplish for the benefit of the Government. These private parties and corporations must have the approval of the Secretary of War before the proceeding could be instituted. Therefore it is, after all, a Government condemnation proceeding; so that it is just a question of difference between tweedledum and tweedledee.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. Yes; I yield.

Mr. KAHN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ROBBINS] spoke of invading the coal mines of Pennsylvania. One of the very purposes of this provision in the bill is to conserve the coal supply of the country. It is believed that by generating enough electric power in the various sections of the country that can turn out supplies for the use of the Government and the Army we can conserve thousands, yes, hundreds of thousands, of tons of coal that would otherwise have to be mined for these utilities.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN], and after that I hope that I can move the previous question on the adoption of the conference report.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from California is recognized.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I was exceedingly pleased to hear the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] speak as he did of the valuable services rendered his country by Gen. Crowder. [Applause.] It has been necessary for me at various times since our entrance into the war, by reason of being a member of the Committee on Military Affairs, to consult with the Judge Advocate General of the Army and the Provost Marshal General, Gen. Crowder occupying both positions. I want to say that I could always find him at his desk as early as 8 o'clock in the morning; I could frequently find him at his desk in the War Department until midnight. His was constructive work. We were embarking on an almost uncharted sea when we enacted the selective draft law. It was reasonable to suppose that hundreds of mistakes would be made and that many people throughout the country would rise in anger against those who were charged with the enforcement of the law. I believe that from the Atlantic to the Pacific and from the Lakes to the Gulf there is but one feeling for Gen. Crowder, and that is a feeling of high regard for his ability, his legal attainments, his honesty of purpose, and his great patriotism. [Applause.]

In having written this letter which the chairman of the committee had read from the desk he did a big thing in a big way, and the country will give him due credit, even if he is not to receive an additional star on his shoulder, for having so graciously and unselfishly asserted that he does not want to be singled out for preferment in face of the fact that there are thousands of others in this country who have also done their patriotic duty and who have no present hope of reward. He voiced the sentiment of an overwhelming number of the Members of this House and his course will be approved generally throughout the Nation. [Applause.]

But I want to call to the attention of the House this important fact: The men in the staff departments of the Army in war times are at a decided disadvantage. They share none of the glamor of war. They are not in the spotlight. They sit at their desks, and Members of this House and men who know nothing about the Army are inclined to sneer at them as swivel-chair officers. Without a proper and efficient force in the swivel chairs, without an able force, without a competent force in the staff departments and bureaus the men in the field could not perform their work. The latter are entirely dependent upon the work of the officers who sit in their chairs at the War Department, studying every detail of the formation of the Army, of the supplies for the Army, of the ammunition for the Army, of the ordnance for the Army; and when one of these officers breaks down, the effect is felt to the remotest trench on the farthest battle fields of Europe where American troops are participating. I hope that the House will never establish the precedent or subscribe to the proposition that, because a man is detailed to perform his duty in one of the bureaus of Washington, all opportunity for advancement should be denied him.

Many of these men are clamoring for an opportunity to be detailed to the front. They know that the opportunities lie there and they want to go. They appeal constantly to be permitted to go, but the Secretary of War has issued his mandate and keeps these officers at their desks. There is nothing for them to do but to submit, as a good soldier always does. So I hope that this House will never take a narrow view of this question. I hope it will never assent to the doctrine that because a man is detailed to one of the departments here in Washington he must forever give up any chance for promotion at the hands of his Government for duty well performed. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired. All time has expired.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the adoption of the conference report.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. DENT, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the conference report was agreed to was laid on the table.

PENSIONS.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill (S. 3798) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy and of wars other than the Civil War, and to certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the statement may be read in lieu of the report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado asks unanimous consent that the statement may be read in lieu of the report. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, the items that have been in disagreement relate only to individual pension claims?

Mr. KEATING. That is all.

Mr. STAFFORD. I assume that the gentleman ought to ask unanimous consent that the report be considered, notwithstanding the rule about printing, but I will make no objection.

The SPEAKER. Has this report been printed?

Mr. KEATING. All I know is that the chairman of the Committee on Pensions is not able to be here to-day, and he asked me to call up these conference reports.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed by the Clerk that the report has been printed. The gentleman from Colorado asks unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the conference report. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the statement of the House conferees.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I remembered that this morning there were two omnibus pension bills presented for printing under the rule, and I was unadvised whether this was one of them or not.

Mr. KEATING. The chairman of the Committee on Pensions left a memorandum asking me to call up these conference reports. He left no explanation concerning their status. JOHN A. KEY,
EDWARD KEATING,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEATING. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH. Is there any particular reason why the pension for Mr. Harrison is restored at a lower rate than was originally provided for in the bill?

Mr. KEATING. In reply to the gentleman I will say that the conferees discuss all these cases. In some instances the House conferees yield, and in other instances we effect a compromise. In this particular case I am not familiar with all the facts, but it was one of the cases where we reached a compromise.

Mr. WALSH. Then I suppose it would be proper to state that in the case of Mr. Harrison they have restored his pension at the lower rate because the conferees had to compromise.

Mr. KEATING. It is not a question of being compelled to compromise, but on the presentation of the case by the Senate conferees the House conferees were convinced that we might allow the soldier the pension suggested.

Mr. WALSH. I see the conferees agreed to strike out the pension for Sallie G. Hardwick. Is that a case where she has deceased, or was there no merit in the claim?

Mr. KEATING. I am not familiar with the facts.

Mr. WALSH. I know the gentleman from Colorado too well to know that he has brought up a matter before the House for consideration, the facts pertaining to which he is not familiar with.

Mr. KEATING. I am sorry to be compelled to disappoint my friend from Massachusetts and to state that he is in error in holding me in such high esteem, because I value his good opinion very much. The fact of the matter is, as I stated in the beginning, the chairman of the Committee on Pensions was unexpectedly called from the House and was unable to take charge of the matter and asked me to call up these reports. I supposed the reports were sufficiently full to supply all the information desired by the gentleman.

Mr. WALSH. They announce that the pension for the lady was stricken from the bill. That is, of course, a sufficient statement. I notice that the gentleman was one of the conferees, and hence my confidence in his ability to furnish any facts relating to the items mentioned in the report. Of course, that confidence is reenforced by the gentleman's well-known ability to state facts and circumstances and make explanations pertaining to any matter in which he is interested. I will say that this estimable lady does not come from the section of the country which I have the honor to represent, but I wondered why the item was dropped by the conferees, and whether or not, as in the case of many others, the beneficiary has deceased, or whether the claim was found on further investigation by the conferees to have no merit.

Mr. KEATING. As I stated to the gentleman, I do not recall the details of this case. These omnibus bills carry scores of claims. I do not pretend to be able to relate all the facts.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman thinks the conference report should be adopted?

Mr. KEATING. I assure the gentleman that I do. The conferees went over these matters very carefully, and I think the gentleman can safely vote for the report.

Mr. WALSH. I thank the gentleman for his assurance.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman from Colorado yield?

Mr. KEATING. I will.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. What my friend from Colorado has stated reenforces the suspicion in my mind that has prevailed for quite a while: That when the conferees met the members of the House conferees were not there. The gentleman has stated that he did not know about these cases. I would inquire whether the gentleman was present when the conference was held.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, I must have a most unfortunate way of expressing myself if I have given the gentleman from Iowa the impression that I was not present at these conferences, or that a majority of the House conferees was not in attendance. I am sure I did not wish to convey that impression. A majority of the House conferees was present and we went over all the cases in controversy with a great deal of care, and in some instances insisted on the House amendments, and in some cases compromised, and in some cases succeeded in winning the Senate over to our view.

I think the gentleman will agree with me that only a man fortunate enough to have seen the light of day for the first time in the State of Massachusetts could carry in "one small head" all the details concerning these cases. I have not been able to do it. My impression is that Mrs. Hardwick's claim was a so-called Key-bill case. The House committee takes the position that where the widow of a Spanish-American War soldier applies for a pension and is unable to show that her husband's death resulted from disabilities incurred in the service we will not grant a pension by special act. The Senate has been a little more liberal than the House, but the House has insisted on its position on the ground that the House would eventually enact general legislation granting Spanish-American War widows the pensions they so richly deserve.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I think, on the whole, I have done the gentleman an injustice and the conferees which represented the House, but my suspicions were really aroused not so much by what happened to the bills that have come from his committee as from those that came from the Committee on Invalid Pensions. The sad fact is only too familiar to the Members of the House that when the bills got into conference they were considered whether the conferees of the House were present or not.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman from Colorado yield?

Mr. KEATING. With pleasure.

Mr. WALSH. I notice that some conference reports are signed by only two members of the managers on the part of the House. I trust the items to which I have referred were not subject to discussion which resulted in one of the conferees refusing to sign the report. If so, I assure the gentleman I have no knowledge of it.

Mr. KEATING. I can assure the gentleman that so far as the report is concerned it represents the opinion of all the conferees.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman stated that the Colorado brand of head is not sufficient to carry all of the details of a conference report, and suggested that possibly the Massachusetts brand was the only kind capable of doing that.

Mr. KEATING. I was thinking of the gentleman's great predecessor, Daniel Webster. [Laughter.]

Mr. WALSH. I assume that I reminded the gentleman of my predecessor because I am so different.

Mr. KEATING. The gentleman is quite right in that observation.

Mr. WALSH. I trust the gentleman takes no offense at these innocent inquiries as to these items in the bill.

Mr. KEATING. Oh, quite the contrary. I feel like apologizing to the gentleman, to be perfectly frank, that I did not secure a copy of the report which was prepared by the Senate Clerk and the House Clerk showing the details of these cases, because with that report here to refresh my memory I could at once have given the gentleman the information which he requests, and to which the gentleman is entitled. The remarks which I have made were in the best of humor.

Mr. WALSH. Oh, I trust the gentleman never loses his temper, particularly on the floor of the House. May I ask the gentleman if he is going to call up the conference report on No. 4191, which was called up second in order?

Mr. KEATING. Apparently, the memorandum furnished me did not contain the correct number. One of the clerks tells me that the number should be 4193 instead of 4191, and, having examined the papers, I find the clerk is correct in that. The chairman merely put down the wrong number.

Mr. WALSH. So, of course, there will be no items in 4191 which will call for any explanation.

Mr. KEATING. Fortunately for me.

Mr. WALSH. I am glad the gentleman is relieved.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 12211, an omnibus pension bill, with Senate amendments, disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 12211, an omnibus pension bill, with Senate amendments, disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Chair announced the following conferees: Mr. KEY, Mr. KEATING, and Mr. SELLS.

JOINT RESOLUTION CONTINUING CERTAIN APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table House joint resolution 311, making appropriations for certain necessary operations of the Government and of the District of Columbia for the months of July and August, 1918, and for other purposes, with Senate amendments thereto, and to concur in the Senate amendments.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table House joint resolution 311, with Senate amendments, and concur in the Senate amendments. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, can the gentleman give assurance that the Senate amendments providing that the resolution for continuing appropriations shall extend to the month of August as well as the month of July will have any value in expediting a recess of the Congress?

Mr. SHERLEY. I am not in position to answer that question definitely, but it is quite possible that one of the Agricultural bills might require a continuation longer than 30 days. It is also possible that this may be true as to the District appropriation bill, which has not yet been agreed to. It can do no harm, because if these bills go through under the terms of this joint resolution the laws take the place of it, and it simply would prevent the need of passing another resolution. It is very important that there shall be a resolution passed as soon as possible, and for that reason I think that the House can well afford to concur in the Senate amendments, which simply change the resolution as it passed the House so as to include the month of August. That is the only difference.

Mr. STAFFORD. It will be of great value, I understand, if the Congress agrees to a recess resolution until some time in August.

Mr. SHERLEY. I can simply say to the gentleman this, that the Senate amendments do not make more difficult a recess.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the Senate amendments.

The Senate amendments were read.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the Senate amendments.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. GILLETT. Will the gentleman from Kentucky yield me five minutes?

Mr. SHERLEY. Certainly.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, I think the attention of the House ought to be called to the peculiar condition in which our appropriation bills have been for the last week, a condition which, as far as I know, is entirely unprecedented in the history of the country. The appropriations for the District of Columbia, for the Agricultural Department, and for the Army expired last Sunday, and because of that the heads of those departments have been subject to fine and imprisonment. I would like to read for the information of the House, because I think it is a serious matter which we ought to bear in mind for the future, the law on this subject.

The law says:

> No executive department or other Government establishment of the United States shall expend in any one fiscal year any sum in excess of appropriation made by Congress for that fiscal year or involve the Government in any contract or other obligation for the future payment of money in excess of such appropriation unless such contract or obligation is authorized by law. Nor shall any department or any officer of the Government accept voluntary service for the Government or employ personal service in excess of that authorized by law except in case of certain emergency involving loss of human life or destruction of property.

Then, again:

> Any person violating any provision of this section shall be summarily removed from office and may also be punished by fine of not less than $100 or imprisoned for not less than one month.

Now, under that law the head of the Department of Agriculture, the head of the Department of War, and the Commissioners of the District ought to be summarily removed from office. They are also liable to a fine of not less than $100 and imprisonment of not less than one month. This applies not only to those bills, but to the legislative and post-office bills. The legislative bill went to the President on June 28, 1918. He kept it until the 1st of July, the day on which all such appropriations end, and then vetoed it. It went back to him upon the 2d of July, and then it was approved, so that there was one day—the 1st of July—on which in every department of the Government every clerk here in Washington was illegally employed, was employed in direct violation of the express statute of law, and all through the week all the District employees have been employed right in the face of that law which says that no voluntary service shall be accepted and nobody shall be employed except as authorized by an appropriation bill. The same is true, as I say, with the Agriculture bill and the Army bill, and was true Monday of every postal employee in the country. Now, this resolution extending the old appropriations went through the House on Tuesday. It was the intention to pass it here on Monday, but the Senate adjourned earlier than was expected, so that it did not go through the House until Tuesday. As far as my recollection goes, whenever these accidents occur, have occurred in the past, so that the new appropriation bills were not ready by the 1st day of July, when the old ones expired, such a continuing resolution as this has always been passed before the 1st of July, but on the theory of law that no fractions of a day are recognized I presume that if it had passed on Monday it would have satisfied the law.

But it went to the Senate Tuesday, and there it has been held from Tuesday until to-day; and, therefore, on every one of those days we have been infracting the law, compelling disobedience of the law, and none of the employees of these departments had any right to be employed and none of the department heads had any right to employ them, and they were all liable to fine and imprisonment and removal from office. I suppose the answer that will be made to us in the Senate is that the Government has not stopped; that they have all been employed and no harm has resulted. But it seems to me we ought to consider whether this lawmaking assembly, the Congress of the United States, is doing its duty in allowing, compelling, and, in fact, effecting such a breach of law, such a violation of its own statutes as this. It is these little violations of law that always in the history of the world have been the excuse and beginnings of tyranny, and they have also been the excuse for anarchy. The way a tyrant gets his power first is by assuming to do something which is illegal but which is necessary, just as our officials have been obliged to do this last week, and then, having once obtained power under good pretext, he turns it against the people and holds it. And in the same way the anarchist, the lyncher, the mob-law advocate says: "It is not necessary to observe the forms of law. What we want is the result, and if we attain the just end, whether it is by mob rule or according to the terms of law, that is all that is necessary; a lynching is just as good as an execution." Now, that is what we have been doing this week, and it seems to me it is a serious matter. Congress should not set an example of disregarding the requirements of law. Congress, and particularly the Senate, should weigh it seriously, and it ought not to be repeated, because it is an express violation of our own statutes and it is encouraging and giving an example of lawlessness; and in a republic the only safety is to recognize and uphold the majesty of the law. And here the Congress of the United States for a week has been assenting to and compelling a disobedience of its own law. And while, of course, the administration officials have done what they ought to have done and have continued the execution of their separate duties, yet they have had to do it in defiance of law and have exposed themselves to removal from office, fine, and imprisonment. And we ought not to allow that to happen again by our fault. [Applause.]

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I agree with what the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] has said, and yet I think it proper to again call attention to the fact that the House is practically in no sense to blame for any of this situation. On Saturday night I was prepared to have a resolution acted upon by the House if the Senate had not by its adjournment made it a useless thing to do. Monday, as soon as the House met, the joint resolution was passed.

Now, this is true touching the supply bills: It is always difficult during any session, short or long, to get the supply bills all passed and on the statute books before the beginning of the fiscal year in the long session or the forced adjournment on the 4th of March in the short session. And the difficulty is nearly as great in the long session as in the short, because it is the session in which a great deal of other legislation is taken up that interferes with the presentation of supply bills. But if that problem has been difficult in the past it has been herculean at this session. We have had to pass deficiency bills, not one but four, from the Committee on Appropriations, any one of which was as large and carried as much money as the total amount heretofore appropriated in peace times for all purposes of the Government. We have had to consider overnight new requests that have arisen by virtue of new developments in the war, and if we were to perform our duty in supplying to the House the information upon which these great grants of money were to be based we had to take an amount of testimony that has been five times greater than what has been necessary in former times.

Now, I say that in justice to my colleagues, who have worked so hard and so faithfully. And it is true that in presenting the bills at the time we did to the House instead of being subject to censure for delay we were entitled to congratulations for the speed with which we have managed bills of such tremendous magnitude. I regret exceedingly that there should pass an hour when it was necessary to do without authority of law those things which were necessary to maintain and continue the Government. But it has been necessary. However, the matter is now cured. It might have been cured earlier if it had not been for the situation that arose in connection with the Agricultural bill and the unwillingness of some Members of another body to permit the resolution to come to a vote. That matter has for the time being gotten out of the way so as to permit this joint resolution to be passed, and I now ask for its consideration.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing——

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I wish to yield two minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON].

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to detain the House for more than a moment, to make a statement that the conferees on the part of the House met with the conferees of the Senate, and they have been unable to agree, although we made several propositions.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may extend my remarks in the RECORD on the principle of the half and half, so that I may put in the RECORD a little data in reference to the history of this matter. I think it would be of interest to the House and should be of interest to the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the half-and-half principle. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on concurring in the Senate amendment.

The Senate amendment was concurred in.

APPLICATIONS FOR PATENTS BY FOREIGNERS.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, if there are no more conference reports to be presented, I would like to ask unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, there is a rather extraordinary situation existing in one of the departments of the Government. Inasmuch as I desire to make a motion in connection with a bill to correct that situation I will use the three minutes allotted to me, in explaining the same.

Under exising law a citizen of any foreign country making application for a patent in his own country has one year thereafter within which to make application in this country. Owing to the disturbances of the war, that year has been found in many instances to be insufficient.

Strange to say, under the trading-with-the-enemy act we have provided by law that a citizen of Germany, or of any one of the countries allied with Germany shall have an extension of time beyond this year, in which to make this application. We did not provide by law for this extension for a citizen of one of our allied countries—England, for instance—so that this situation prevails to-day, that with respect to the extension of time within which applications may be made, a citizen of Germany, or of some country allied with Germany has a preferential position, as compared with a citizen of any one of the allied countries.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is not the reason for the difference that all communication between Germany and Austria-Hungary is suspended, whereas there is no difficulty of communication between the citizens of the allied countries?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Of course, the suggestion of the gentleman furnishes a reason why we should have made this provision in the case of Germany, and of her allies, but it furnishes no reason why we should put the citizens of Great Britain, and of the other allied countries in the present anomalous situation. Of course, there have been great disturbances in the mails. I will point out to the gentleman that a bill has been passed by the Senate to remedy the inequality complained of.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I wish to get the facts before the House. I am not declining to yield except on account of lack of time. A bill has been enacted by the Senate that cures the defect, in our laws, and providing that as opportunity has been given to the citizens of Germany to make application after the year has passed, a like opportunity will be given to citizens of Great Britain, and to the allies of Great Britain. There are 100 cases that are hung up to-day in the Patent Office by reason of the uncertainty of the law, and the Secretary of the Interior has asked that a bill be passed definitely giving to the citizens of the allied countries, the rights that have been given to the citizens of Germany and her allies.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time may be extended five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Virginia be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. The Senate has passed the bill correcting this situation. The House Committee on Patents unanimously reported a bill precisely to the effect of the Senate bill. This House bill was reported before the bill came over from the Senate. It was intended under the House rules to ask for action on the Senate bill, but by inadvertence this bill was referred to the Committee on Patents. Hence it is now necessary to ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee on Patents from further consideration of the Senate bill and thereby bring about precisely the same situation as if it had remained on the desk of the Speaker.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD Do I understand that the bill that the gentleman seeks to have considered grants to all residents of countries allied with the United States an indefinite time within which to file applications for patents, provided the same privilege is granted by those countries to citizens of the United States?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Yes; there must be reciprocal action in this matter. It is not an indefinite time. The gentleman is mistaken about that. It is nine months beyond the expiration of the period provided under the present law.

Mr. STAFFORD. I would like to have the gentleman explain what difficulty has prevented citizens of these allied countries from taking out letters patent in this country? They have been granted a year additional. Why should we grant them another nine months' extension?

I know of many American inventors who have applied for patents since our entrance into the war, who have not sought an extension of time to get letters patent from foreign countries.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. The Secretary of the Interior reports that there are something like 100 cases now pending at the Patent Office, that can not be acted upon, and unless this legislation is passed, these applications for patents will fail.

Mr. STAFFORD. There may be 100 foreigners who have not within the year filed their claims for patents with the Patent Office, but what has prevented them from coming here and filing their claims for patents?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. The disturbances growing out of the war.

Mr. STAFFORD. Communication has continued during that time.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. It has been greatly interrupted. Permit me to read an extract from a letter from the Acting Secretary of the Interior. It is certainly a most anomalous situation that the citizens of Germany and of the countries allied with Germany, should have greater opportunities under our laws than the citizens of our allies.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is that because communication has ceased between Germany and this country?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Communication with respect to the other countries has been interrupted, if it has not entirely ceased.

Mr. STAFFORD. The foreign inventors have a year in which to apply. Why could not they have taken out their letters patent during that year?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Here is what the Secretary of the Interior says in relation to that:

> Until this act is passed we will be in the position of extending privileges under the trading-with-the-enemy act to our enemies while denying the same privileges to our allies, which is, of course, regrettable.
> The commissioner states that this proposed bill was introduced in the Senate (S. 3524) and in the House (H. R. 8763), but no further action has been taken, and I write to request that since there can be no objection to this bill, and since there are numerous cases in the Patent Office that are awaiting action the bill be passed during the present session if possible.

That is the situation. If there is any further inquiry in relation to the facts I would be very glad to answer the same.

Now, Mr. Speaker, having explained why the bill is not on the Speaker's table, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Patents may be discharged from the consideration of this bill (S. 3524), and that it may be restored to its place on the Speaker's table, so that the House may act upon it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to discharge the Committee on Patents from the further consideration of this bill and to consider it now. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, what does the Committee on Patents say about that?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. This motion is made on behalf of the Committee on Patents. Before the Senate bill was passed the House Committee on Patents reported favorably a bill which is not only substantially the same bill, but identically the same bill.

Mr. WALSH. A bill similar in terms has since passed the Senate?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. The Committee on Patents intended to ask that action be taken on the Senate bill, but by inadvertence the bill was sent to the Committee on Patents instead of remaining on the Speaker's table. The committee did not desire that reference.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I believe the bill should first be read before consent is given.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act entitled "An act to extend temporarily the time for filing applications and fees and taking action in the United States Patent Office in favor of nations granting reciprocal rights to United States citizens," approved August 17, 1916, be amended to read as follows.

"That any applicant for letters patent or for registration of any trade-mark, print, or label, being within the provisions of this act, if unable during war or within six months thereafter, on account of conditions arising out of war, to file any application or pay any official fee or take any required action within the period now limited by law, shall be granted an extension of nine months beyond the expiration of said period.

"SEC. 2. That the provisions of this act shall be limited to citizens or subjects of countries which extend substantially similar privileges to the citizens of the United States.

"SEC. 3. That this act shall be operative to relieve from default under existing law occurring since August 1, 1914, and all applications and letters patent and registrations in the filing or prosecution whereof default has occurred for which this act grants relief shall have the same force and effect as if said default had not occurred."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I wish to direct the attention of the gentleman having the bill in charge to the phraseology of section 1. The gentleman stated that the only purpose of this act was to extend the time nine months. If I am not in error in my reading of section 1, it grants to all applicants for patents living in foreign countries other than those of the enemy the right to file an application for a patent nine months after the termination of the war.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. That is in the case in which the citizen has made his application abroad, but, due to these interruptions which I have stated, he has not gotten it within the year that we now give him. We have given precisely this right to the citizens of Germany and of her allied countries.

Mr. STAFFORD. We have granted to foreign inventors the right to file application for the period of one year beyond the time previously fixed.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. No; within one year after they make their applications at home.

Mr. STAFFORD. I know many American inventors who perhaps would not wish, by reason of the uncertainty of the conditions abroad, to file an application for a patent in a foreign country. But why should we grant to foreigners, even though they are citizens of our allies, the privilege of having their applications for patents filed in their native country, and give them the protection of filing a patent in this country, until nine months after the termination of the war?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Let me call the attention of gentlemen to the fact that we do not give this right to citizens of any foreign country unless the reciprocal right is given by that country to the inventors of this country. We put them upon precisely the same foundation. This law is not operative as to any country which does not extend to citizens of our country precisely the right that is proposed to be extended to the citizens of their country.

Mr. STAFFORD. The inventors of our country are not asking this privilege.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I understand that they are.

Mr. STAFFORD. The Commissioner of Patents is making the request on the part of foreigners who are in default and can not get protection under the patent laws.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. No; as I understand the condition of the foreigner is, it is no different from our own people. We are not giving to the foreigner anything that is not given to the inventors of this country.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman is a member of the Committee on Patents, and I assume that he is——

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. No; I am not.

Mr. NOLAN. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. NOLAN. I am familiar with the terms of this bill, having been a member of the Committee on Patents for six years. I know that the gentleman is not a member of the committee——

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. No; but I am familiar with the features of the bill.

Mr. NOLAN. I do not object to the gentleman calling up the bill, but I can not understand why the ranking Democratic member of the committee did not handle the bill.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I can answer that in a moment. If there is any objection going to be made on that line, which I did not presume there would be—the chairman of the committee saw me this morning and said he was going away in anticipation of the recess and he expected to call up this bill. He outlined the facts to me which I have outlined, but if there is anybody in the House objecting to it I want to say that I am not disposed to take the burden of any Member of the House in that particular.

Mr. NOLAN. I think it is a rather novel thing for the chairman of a committee to ask a Member of the House, not a member of the committee, to call up a bill, ignoring the minority.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. He ignored the majority if you put it on the ground of ignoring. He asked me to bring it up.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, the inventors of this country are not on the same plane as the foreign inventors so far as the privileges received under patents in foreign countries are concerned. Nearly every country other than the United States requires that within a definite period, usually one or two years, the patentee must manufacture the patent in that country to continue its validity. That limitation is not required in this country. This bill seeks to give an additional right to foreign inventors, and for that reason I object.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had agreed to the reports of the committees of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to bills of the following titles:

S. 4193. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy and of wars other than the Civil War, and to certain widows and dependent relatives of soldiers and sailors;

S. 3798. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy and of wars other than the Civil War, and to certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors; and

S. 4542. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy and of wars other than the Civil War, and to certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

WAR-RISK INSURANCE.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that House bill 11048 with Senate amendments be laid before the House for the purpose of moving to concur in the Senate amendments.

The SPEAKER. What is the status of the bill?

Mr. SIMS. The House passed a bill, it went to the Senate, and the Senate has amended it in slight particulars.

The SPEAKER. Are any of the amendments to be considered in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. SIMS. Not one.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House a bill of which the Clerk will read the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 11048) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the establishment of a Bureau of War-Risk Insurance in the Treasury Department," approved September 2, 1914, as amended by the act approved June 12, 1917.

The Senate amendments were read.

Mr. WALSH. Will not the gentleman from Tennessee state to the House the effect of the several amendments which have been put on by the Senate?

Mr. SIMS. The effect of the amendments is nothing more than verbal amendments. They have stricken out the words "act entitled 'An act to authorize the establishment of a Bureau of War-Risk Insurance in the Treasury Department,' approved September 2, 1914, as amended by the act approved June 12, 1917," and inserted the words "war-risk insurance act."

And then in section 9 it struck out the words "it authorizes the insurance by the United States against loss or damage by risk of war" and inserts instead the words "the Division of Marine and Seamen's Insurance is concerned." These are only perfecting verbal amendments and do not change any provision of the law as it passed the House.

Mr. WALSH. It makes it briefer and clearer.

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the Senate amendments.

The question was taken, and the Senate amendments were agreed to.

The title was amended to conform with the text.

On motion of Mr. SIMS, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the Senate amendments were agreed to was laid on the table.

PENSIONS FOR WIDOWS AND MINOR CHILDREN OF OFFICERS, WAR WITH SPAIN, ETC.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 4444) to pension widows and minor children of officers and enlisted men who served in the War with Spain, Philippine insurrection, or in China, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, I object.

BRIDGE ACROSS TUG RIVER, KY.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 3009) granting the consent of Congress to the P. M. C. Coal Co. to construct and maintain a bridge across Tug River, connecting Pike County, Ky., and Mingo County, W. Va., which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to the P. M. C. Coal Co., and its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across Tug River at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, one end of the said bridge being in Pike County, Ky., near the western portal of Hatfield Tunnel of the Norfolk & Western Railway, and the other end of the said bridge being on the opposite side of Tug River, in Mingo County, in the State of West Virginia, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BARKLEY, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

FRANK BARBER.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Speaker lay before the House Senate bill 4790, for the relief of Frank Barber, which is now on the Speaker's table.

The SPEAKER. What is the parliamentary status of the bill?

Mr. ROGERS. This bill has passed the Senate. An identical bill has since been reported unanimously by the House Committee on Military Affairs.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House the bill, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed, out of any moneys not otherwise appropriated, to pay to Frank Barber, a first lieutenant of the Dorset Regiment of Infantry of the British Army, who lost the sight of both eyes and became totally blind by reason of a premature explosion on February 14, 1918, while acting as an instructor of United States troops at Camp Wheeler, Ga., as compensation for disability resulting therefrom, such sums of money as by the act of Congress approved October 6, 1917, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to authorize the establishment of a Bureau of War-Risk Insurance in the Treasury Department,' approved September 2, 1914, and for other purposes," is provided to be paid as compensation for disability to an injured person who has lost both eyes or become totally blind from causes occurring in the line of duty in the service of the United States; and such compensation shall be payable and be paid as of and from the 14th day of February, 1918, and under and according to the terms, conditions, and basis of computation in said act provided, and such sum shall be in full of all claims, legal or equitable, of the said Frank Barber, his heirs, representatives, or assigns.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, is it not necessary to consider this bill in Committee of the Whole?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to consider the bill in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, one other parliamentary inquiry. Is it not necessary for the gentleman to get unanimous consent to have this bill considered at all, for the reason that it involves a charge on the Treasury.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman will have to get unanimous consent.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered at this time.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I do not think we should play favorites in the consideration of these private bills. There should be a call of the private calendar and the bills taken up in order.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman object?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I object.

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

Under clause 2, Rule XXIV, Senate bill of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee, as indicated below:

NOBEL PEACE PRIZE.

Mr. GALLIVAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the House joint resolution which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 313) providing for the disposition of moneys represented in the Alfred Bernard Nobel peace prize, awarded in 1906.

Whereas in compliance with the expressed desire of Theodore Roosevelt Congress passed an act entitled "An act to establish the Foundation for the Promotion of Industrial Peace," appointed March 2, 1907, in which act trustees were created and appointed with power to accept from the said Theodore Roosevelt the money gift carried as a part of the Nobel peace prize awarded him in the year 1906; and

Whereas the trustees or industrial peace committee created under said act still has in its custody the moneys represented in the said Nobel prize, and accretions thereto, and has not found it practicable to dispose of the same in accordance with the provisions of said act: Therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That the industrial peace committee created under an act of Congress entitled "An act to establish the Foundation for the Promotion of Industrial Peace," approved March 2, 1907, be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to return to the Hon. Theodore Roosevelt the sum of money in its hands, principal and interest, represented in the Nobel peace prize, and placed with it in accord with the expressed desires and purposes of Theodore Roosevelt in 1907.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. GALLIVAN, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed was laid on the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Tulley, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 12281) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919.

IMMEDIATE TRANSPORTATION OF DUTIABLE MERCHANDISE.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill H. R. 12002, reported unanimously by the Committee on Ways and Means.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 12002) for the establishment of Bar Harbor, in the State of Maine, as a port of entry and delivery for the immediate transportation without appraisement of dutiable merchandise.

Be it enacted, etc., That the privileges of the first and seventh sections of the act approved June 10, 1880, as amended, governing the immediate transportation of dutiable merchandise without appraisement, be and are hereby extended to the port of Bar Harbor, in the district of Portland, in the State of Maine.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, will the gentleman advise the House why the committee recommends the designation of Bar Harbor, not only as a port of entry but also as being exempted from the provision of section 7? The gentleman's committee has reported two bills, one relating to Bar Harbor and another one to Oswego, N. Y., but at Oswego, N. Y., you do not confer the same grant of power that you do at Bar Harbor, Me., and I wish to inquire what is the reason for granting greater authority to Bar Harbor?

Mr. TREADWAY. They are identical.

Mr. STAFFORD. I beg the gentleman's pardon, they are different. I wish to inquire of some member of the committee the reason why they grant the summer resort at Bar Harbor, Me., greater power than they do to a manufacturing city like Oswego?

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, the two bills are both reported by the Ways and Means Committee unanimously, and as I read the language they are identical and are both recommended by the Treasury Department in a letter signed by the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, one letter to Mr. KITCHIN under date of May 31, and the other having to do with Oswego under date of April 25, both of which I will be pleased to read for the information of the House if it seems necessary. It is simply a formality that has frequently been done in the past and a matter of convenience, nothing else. It does not appoint any additional officials and avoids confusion in those ports.

Mr. STAFFORD. I wish the gentleman would read the bill providing for the port of entry at Oswego.

Mr. TREADWAY. That is not now before the House, but I would be very glad to read it for the information of the House.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman says they are identical. As I recall from a reading of the bills, there is a difference between the two bills, and I am rising for information as to why the Committee on Ways and Means grants greater power to Bar Harbor than it does to Oswego?

Mr. TREADWAY. I will apologize to the gentleman; he is correct. The phraseology is different, in that it reads in the case of Bar Harbor:

That the privileges of the first and seventh sections of the act approved June 10, 1880, as amended, governing the immediate transportation of dutiable merchandise without appraisement, be, and are hereby, extended to the port of Bar Harbor, the district of Portland, in the State of Maine.

The one in reference to Oswego, which is the next one on the calendar, does not refer to section 7.

Mr. STAFFORD. Can the gentleman give information as to the reason why they made that differentiation?

Mr. TREADWAY. I shall be glad to insert sections 1 and 7 of the act of June 10, 1880, in the RECORD:

Be it enacted, etc., That when any merchandise, other than explosive articles, and articles in bulk not provided for in section 4 of this act, imported at the ports of New York, Philadelphia, Boston, Baltimore, Portland and Bath, in Maine, Chicago, Port Huron, Detroit, New Orleans, Norfolk, Charleston, Savannah, Mobile, Galveston, Pensacola, Fla., Cleveland, Toledo, and San Francisco, shall appear by the invoice or bill or lading and manifest of the importing vessel to be consigned to and destined for either of the ports specified in the seventh section of this act, the collector at the port of arrival shall allow the said merchandise to be shipped immediately after the entry prescribed in section 2 of this act has been made.

* * * * * * *

SEC. 7. That the privilege of immediate transportation shall extend to the ports of New York and Buffalo, in New York; Burlington, in Vermont; Boston, in Massachusetts; Providence and Newport, in Rhode Island; New Haven, Middletown, and Hartford, in Connecticut; Philadelphia and Pittsburgh, in Pennsylvania; Baltimore, Crisfield, and Annapolis, in Maryland; Wilmington and Seaford, in Delaware; Salem, Mass.; Georgetown, in the District of Columbia; Norfolk, Richmond, and Petersburg, in Virginia; Wilmington and Newberne, in North Carolina; Charleston and Port Royal, in South Carolina; Savannah and Brunswick, in Georgia; New Orleans, in Louisiana; Portland and Bath, in Maine; Portsmouth, in New Hampshire; Chicago, Cairo, Alton, and Quincy, in Illinois; Detroit, Port Huron, and Grand Haven, in Michigan; St. Louis, Kansas City, and St. Joseph, in Missouri; St. Paul, in Minnesota; Cincinnati, Cleveland, and Toledo, in Ohio; Milwaukee and La Crosse, in Wisconsin; Louisville, in Kentucky; San Francisco, San Diego, and Wilmington, in California; Portland, in Oregon; Memphis,

Nashville, and Knoxville, in Tennessee; Mobile, in Alabama; and Evansville, in Indiana; and Galveston, Houston, Brownsville, Corpus Christi, and Indianola, in Texas; Omaha, in Nebrska; Dubuque, Burlington, and Keokuk, in Iowa; Leavenworth, in Kansas; Tampa Bay, Fernandina, Jacksonville, Cedar Keys, Key West, and Apalachicola, in Florida: Provided, That the privilege of transportation herein conferred shall not extend to any place at which there are not the necessary officers for the appraisement of merchandise and the collection of duties.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. TREADWAY, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman in reference to the Oswego bill.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill H. R. 8839, reported by the Committee on Ways and Means.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 8839) for the establishment of Oswego, in the State of New York, as a port of entry for immediate transportation without appraisement of dutiable merchandise.

Be it enacted, etc., That the privileges of the first section of the act approved June 10, 1880, governing the immediate transportation of dutiable merchandise without appraisement, be, and are hereby, extended to the port of Oswego, in the State of New York.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Pennsylvania rise?

Mr. ROBBINS. I desire to ask the gentleman in reference to what commerce there is at Oswego that requires the establishment of a port of entry and to create a collector of the port——

Mr. TREADWAY. There is no collector to be established at all. It simply allows merchandise to pass through in bond that is landed there; it does not require any officials to be appointed.

Mr. ROBBINS. Where does the commerce come from and where does it pass to?

Mr. TREADWAY. It is a lake point.

Mr. ROBBINS. On Lake Ontario?

Mr. TREADWAY. Yes.

Mr. ROBBINS. Would not there be some offices there, and would it not be an expense on the Government?

Mr. TREADWAY. As I understand it, there is no intention whatever, nor does the bill carry any right, to establish any offices whatever. It would be continued in its present location, simply allowing goods to pass through in bond.

Mr. ROBBINS. Well, all right.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. TREADWAY, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

VENTILATION OF THE HALL OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. PARK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the Senate joint resolution 165.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the resolution which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (S. J. Res. 165) to appoint a joint committee to consider the question of ventilation of the House of Representatives and the Senate.

Resolved, etc., That a joint committee of seven be appointed to consider the question of ventilation of the House of Representatives and the Senate, three members of said committee to be appointed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives and three members to be appointed by the Presiding Officer of the Senate; and Elliott Woods, Superintendent Capitol Building and Grounds, to be the seventh member of said committee.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I object.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman object or reserve the right to object?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I reserve the right to object.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, when is this committee to pursue its investigation?

Mr. PARK. During the recess, if we have one.

Mr. WALSH. Then, of course, they will not pursue any investigation and there will be no need for passing this resolution.

Mr. PARK. That is a question. I think they will investigate.

Mr. WALSH. When? During the night?

Mr. PARK. No; during the recess, if we have a recess; or, if we do not have a recess, they can investigate anyway.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman means during the recess between the end of the short session of this Congress and the beginning of the Sixty-sixth Congress?

Mr. PARK. No; I mean in the next 30 or 40 days, if we have a recess.

Mr. WALSH. We will have the next 30 or 40 days, but, I think, without a recess.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARK. I will.

Mr. CANNON. We have been making investigations as to the ventilation ever since I have been coming to this House, which is over a generation. We have employed architects and torn up the floor and done all kinds of things to the House. I think the law has not been repealed that was written upon the statute books to overhaul this whole House and cut it into about one-third of the size of the Hall of the House now. That law has never been enforced. It seems to me, considering the past history of ventilation and the desire to change the Hall of the House, that in the closing days of the session I will have to object.

Mr. PARK. The resolution does not carry an appropriation at all; and if they do not investigate, there will be no harm done.

Mr. CANNON. I doubt if we have architects in the Senate or the House that would agree with outside architects.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield, with the consent of the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. Speaker, can the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] inform the House as to what has ever been done with the recommendation of a commission providing for the rearrangement of the interior of the Hall of the House of Representatives? As I recall, some 10 years ago a commission was authorized providing for the rearrangement of this Chamber. I believe the plan proposed was to remove the southerly wall to the outer wall of the building. I am under the impression that the committee made a report and it is awaiting action by the Congress.

Mr. CANNON. No; the legislation, as I recollect it, was enacted years ago, and, to avail myself of an expression of former President Cleveland, is still upon the statute books, and, I believe, in that place, if it can be located, where "innocuous desuetude" prevails.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I object.

EAST ST. LOUIS RIOTS (H. DOC. NO. 1231).

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Kentucky rise?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. For several months now the committee that was sent to East St. Louis to make an investigation has been ready to report, and there is a standing order of the House making it a special privilege to report, and I would like to make the report now.

The SPEAKER. You do not want to interfere with conference reports, if there are any more of them? The Chair will recognize the gentleman, subject to that condition.

Mr. GILLETT. May I ask about how long it will take the gentleman?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. There are about 40 or 50 pages of it.

Mr. GILLETT. Are you going to read it?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. GILLETT. Why not print it? We would be glad to hear the gentleman if he were going to talk offhand, but if he is going to read it——

Mr. CANNON. Oh, well, if conference reports or appropriation bills interrupt it, the reading could stop at once.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will only recognize the gentleman on that condition.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I read:

"Your committee appointed under House resolution No. 128 for the purpose of making investigation of the East St. Louis riots which occurred on May 28 and July 2, 1917, reports that as a result of unlawful conditions existing at that place, interstate commerce was not only openly and violently interrupted but was virtually suspended for a week or 10 days during and following the riot of last July. For months after the July riot interstate commerce was interfered with and hindered, not, however, by open acts of violence, but by a subtle and effective intimidation of colored men who had been employed by the railroads to handle freight consigned from one State to another. So many of these men were driven out of East St. Louis as the result of the July riot that the railroads could not secure necessary help. After the worst effects of the riot had passed this class of labor remained so frightened and intimidated that it would not live in East St. Louis. Some of them took up their residences across the river in St. Louis, and would go over to East St. Louis in the morning to work and would return to that place before nightfall. In order to get out of East St. Louis and back to St. Louis before night came on the length of the day's work was reduced. The fright of these laborers went to such an extent—and it was fully justified by existing conditions—that special means of transportation had to be provided for them back and forth between St. Louis and East St. Louis in order to get them to work at all. Besides the killing of a number of these negro laborers, a very large number, indeed, fled from the work and never returned to it. In addition to this 44 freight cars were burned and serious damage done to the railroad tracks, all of which will be referred to further along in this report.

"Your committee made an earnest, nonpartisan effort to determine the basic cause of the riot. We endeavored to pursue every avenue of information to its source, searched the hearts and consciences of all witnesses, and sought the opinions of men in every walk of life. The officers of the mills and factories placed the blame at the door of organized labor; but the overwhelming weight of testimony, to which is added the convictions of the committee, ascribes the mob spirit and its murderous manifestations to the bitter race feeling that had grown up between the whites and the blacks.

"The natural racial aversion, which finds expression in mob violence in the North as in the South, was augmented in East St. Louis by hundreds of petty conflicts between the whites and the blacks. During the year 1917 between 10,000 and 12,000 negroes came from the Southern States to seek work at promised high wages in the industries of St. Clair County. They swarmed into the railroad stations on every train, to be met by their friends who formed reception committees and welcomed them to the financial, political and socialliberty which they had been led to believe Illinois guaranteed. They seldom had more than enough money to exactly defray their transportation, and they arrived dirty and hungry. They stood around the street corners in homesick huddles, seeking shelter and hunting work.

"How to deal with them soon became a municipal problem. Morning found them gathered at the gates of the manufactories, where often they were chosen in preference to the white men who also sought employment. But as rapidly as employment was found for those already there fresh swarms arrived from the South, until the great number without employment menaced the prosperity and safety of the community.

"The Aluminum Ore Co. brought hundreds and hundreds of them to the city as strike breakers, to defeat organized labor, a precedent which aroused intense hatred and antagonism and caused countless tragedies as its aftermath. The feeling of resentment grew with each succeeding day. White men walked the streets in idleness, their families suffering for food and warmth and clothes, while their places as laborers were taken by strange negroes who were compelled to live in hovels and who were used to keep down wages.

"It was proven conclusively that the various industries in St. Clair County were directly responsible for the importation of these negroes from the South. Advertisements were printed in various Southern newspapers urging the negroes to come to East St. Louis and promising them big wages. In many instances agents were sent through the South to urge the negroes to abandon profitable employment there and come to East St. Louis, where work was said to be plentiful and wages high.

"One of the local railroads sent an agent to the Southern States, and on some trips he brought back with him as many as 30 or 40 negro men, all of them employed at their southern homes, making from $2 to $2.50 a day. A number of these men testified before the committee that they were promised $2.40 a day 'and board' if they would come to East St. Louis; but when they did come they were paid only $1.40 a day, with an allowance of 60 cents a day for board, and were fed on coffee, bread and 'lasses' and made to sleep on sacks in box cars, where they suffered keenly from the cold.

"Responsibility for this influx of 10,000 or more negroes into East St. Louis rests on the railroads and the manufacturing establishments, and they must bear their share of the responsibility for the ensuing arson and murder that followed this unfortunate invasion.

"It is a lamentable fact that the employers of labor paid too little heed to the comfort or welfare of their men. They saw them crowded into wretched cabins, without water or any of the conveniences of life; their wives and children condemned to live in the disreputable quarters of the town, and made no effort to lift them out of the mire.

"The negroes gravitated to the unsanitary sections, existed in the squalor of filthy cabins, and made no complaint; but the white workmen had a higher outlook, and the failure to provide them with better homes added to their bitter dissatisfaction with the burdens placed upon them by having to compete with black labor. This resentment spread until it included thousands who did not have to work with their hands.

"Ten thousand and more strange negroes added to the already large colored population soon made East St. Louis a center of lawlessness. Within less than a year before the riot over 800 'holdups' were committed in the city. More than 80 per cent of the murders were committed by negroes. Highway robberies were nightly occurrences; rape was frequent; while a host of petty offenses kept the law-abiding citizens in a state of terror.

"White women were afraid to walk the streets at night; negroes sat in their laps on street cars; black women crowded them from their seats; they were openly insulted by drunken negroes. The low saloons and gambling houses were crowded with idle vagabonds; the dance halls in the negro sections were filled with prostitutes, half clad, in some instances naked, performing lewd dances.

"Negroes were induced to buy homes in white districts by unscrupulous real estate agents; and, as a consequence, the white people sold their homes at a sacrifice and moved elsewhere.

"Owners of cheap property preferred negroes as tenants, charging them $15 a month rent for houses for which white workmen had paid only $10.

"Corrupt politicians found the negro vote fitted to their foul purpose, and not only bought them on election day, but in the interval protected them in their dens of vice, their low saloons and barrel houses. They had immunity in the courts; crooked lawyers kept them out of jail; and a disorganized, grafting police force saw to it that they were not molested.

"East St. Louis wallowed in a mire of lawlessness and unshamed corruption. Criminals from every quarter of the country gathered there, unmolested and safe from detection.

"This was the condition of affairs on the night of July 1, 1917, when an automobile—some witnesses say there were two—went through a negro section of the city and fired promiscuously into their homes. No one was injured, but the act aroused a fierce spirit in the breasts of the negroes.

"The ringing of a church bell at midnight, which was a prearranged signal, drew a crowd of negroes from that immediate section armed with guns and pistols. They marched through the streets ready to avenge the attack on their homes. They had not gone far until an automobile containing several policemen and a newspaper reporter crossed their path, having been notified by telephone that there was danger of an outbreak. The negroes cursed them and told them to drive on, although one of the detectives flashed his police badge and assured them that they had come to protect them.

"For answer the negro mob fired a volley into the machine which, at the first shot, drove rapidly away. The negroes continued to empty their guns and pistols, with the result that one of the officers was instantly killed and another so badly wounded that he died later.

"The police automobile, riddled with bullets, stood in front of police headquarters next morning and thousands viewed it. The early editions of the papers gave full details of the tragedy of the night before. And, on July 2, East St. Louis awoke to a realization of the awful fact that the dread which had knocked at every heart for months could no longer be denied. Years of lawlessness had at last borne bloody fruit. As the day wore on negro mobs killed other white men, and shot at men and women who were offering them no wrong.

"Dr. McQuillan, a well-known physician, and his wife were dragged from their machine and shamefully abused. The doctor was shot, his ribs were broken, and both he and his wife were badly beaten. One of his assailants remarked, "Boys, this is Dr. McQuillan, the Aluminum Ore Co. doctor," and pleaded for his life. The would-be murderers, some of whom must have been employed by the Ore Co., helped the doctor and his wife into their machine and, cranking it for them, sent them on their way.

"The news of these murders and fresh outrages spread rapidly, and the streets soon filled with excited people. Men and boys, girls and women of the town began to attack every negro in sight. All fared alike, young and old, women and children; none was spared. The crowd soon grew to riotous proportions, and for hours the man hunt continued, stabbing, clubbing and shooting, not the guilty but unoffending negroes. One was hanged from a telephone pole and another had a rope tied around his neck and was dragged through the streets, the maddened crowd kicking and beating him as he lay prostrate and helpless.

"The negroes were pursued into their homes and the torch completed the work of destruction. As they fled from the flames they were shot down, although many of them came out with uplifted hands, pleading to be spared.

"It was a day and night given over to arson and murder. Scenes of horror that would have shocked a savage were viewed with placid unconcern by hundreds, whose hearts knew no pity, and who seemed to revel in the feast of blood and cruelty.

"It is not possible to give accurately the number of dead. At least 39 negroes and 8 white people were killed outright, and hundreds of negroes were wounded and maimed. 'The bodies of the dead negroes,' testified an eyewitness, 'were thrown into a morgue like so many dead hogs.'

"There were 312 buildings and 44 railroad freight cars and their contents destroyed by fire; a total loss of $393,600. Your committee can not go into all the harrowing details of how the negroes—men, women and children—were killed and burned during the riot, but there were so many flagrantly cruel cases that a bare recital of the facts concerning some of them will be given.

"At Collinsville and Illinois Avenues a negro man and his wife and 14-year-old boy were assaulted. The man was beaten to death; his head was crushed in as if by a blow from a stone, and the boy was shot and killed. The woman was very badly injured; her hair was torn out by the roots and her scalp was partly torn off by some one who took hold of the ragged edges of a wound and scalped her. After a time an ambulance drove up and the bodies of these three negroes were loaded into it. The father and the son were dead, and when the woman regained consciousness she found herself lying on the dead bodies of her husband and child. This family lived across the Mississippi River in St. Louis and were on their way home after having been on a fishing trip north of East St. Louis. They were innocent of any connection with the race feeling that brought about the riot and were victims of the savage brutality of the mob, who spared neither age nor sex in their blind lust for blood.

"Another negro who was trying to escape from a mob of 30 or 40 men was knocked down, kicked in the face, beaten into insensibility; and then a man stood over him and shot him five times as he lay helpless in the street.

"A white man shot at a negro and killed another white man, his bad aim infuriating the mob that pursued the unoffending negro.

"Two negroes were taken from a street car at Illinois and Collinsville Avenues. They were on their way to St. Louis to escape the fury of the mob. Both were killed.

"Near the stock yards a white man knocked a negro senseless from a wagon, and when two reporters offered to take the wounded man to the hospital another white man threatened their lives and forced them to drive away and leave him.

"At Collinsville and Division Avenues a mob of about 100 men drove a negro into the street, knocked him down, stamped on his face, and one of the crowd drew a pistol and shot him through the head, the bullet coming out between his eyes.

"An old negro, about 70 years old, stepped off a street car, having come from St. Louis on his way home. The mob immediately attacked him with such fury that he was left senseless after being stoned and beaten. A witness who described this particular case to your committee said: 'This old man, his dinner bucket lying on the ground beside him, apparently was dead, although he had his arm arched up over his face as if to protect himself from blows. About that time an ambulance driver came up and started to pick him up to put him into the ambulance. A white man standing over him said, "If you pick up this negro, you'll get what he got." I saw that same negro in the undertaking establishment the next day, dead, with his arm still arched over his face.'

"Around Third Street and Brady Avenue the mob was firing promiscuously into houses and sheds where the negroes had taken shelter. Every time one of them ran from these houses he was shot and killed.

"The rioting continued all along Broadway, between Collinsville Avenue and Eighth Street; houses were burned and the poor wretches were driven from their homes or shot as they were trying to escape the flames. Two of them, with hands above their heads, were shot and killed.

"A negro child 2 years old was shot and thrown into the doorway of a burning building, and nothing ever was found of the remains.

"There was a crippled negro who took care of the horses and mules for the Hill-Thomas Lime & Cement Co. He was a faithful, hard-working, loyal fellow. The day of the riot his employer's stable was in the path of the flames. He called up Mr. Thomas, his boss, on the telephone, and said: 'I just called you up to tell you good-bye. I'm here in de barn, and I ain't goin' to leave; I've turned all de stock out; I'm going to stay here; I'm not going outside to be shot.'

"This faithful negro must have been consumed in the flames as no trace of him ever was found.

"It is impossible to say how many people perished in the 312 houses that were burned by the mob, but many negroes who lived in those houses still are missing, and it is not possible to get an accurate report as to just how many found death in the flames.

"East St. Louis for many years has been a plague spot; within its borders and throughout its environs every offense in the calendar of crime and every lapse in morals and public decency has been openly committed, each day increasing the terrors of the law-abiding. No terms of condemnation, applied to the men who were responsible for the appalling conditions revealed before your committee, can be too severe. No punishment that outraged justice may visit upon them will be adequate. In many cases they deserve the extreme penalty; in every case they merit the execration of a despoiled and disgraced community.

"The purpose of the politicians of both political parties, who found East St. Louis respected and prosperous and in a few years robbed its treasury, gave away valuable franchises, sank it in the mire of pollution, and brought upon it national censure and disgrace, was deliberate. They united to elect men to high office who would further their schemes of spoliation even when they feared to share their plunder. It was a conspiracy as shameless as it was confident. They left nothing to chance. It took account of the executive; it provided for an unscrupulous legislative board; it made certain of police commissioners who would take orders and deliver the goods; it embraced the courts high and low; it went into partnership with every vile business; it protected every lawless saloon; it encouraged houses of prostitution in the very shadow of the city hall; it gave protection to gamblers, immunity to thieves and murderers.

"The gang that took possession of East St. Louis harbored the offscourings of the earth. The vag, the safe blower and the 'stick-up man' flocked to its sheltering arms, safe from arrest or disturbance.

"The good people of this sorely afflicted community were powerless. The chamber of commerce, which should have had the courage to rally the law-abiding and drive out the lawless, was ineffective. They actually 'laid upon the table' a resolution of inquiry to investigate the conditions that made property unsafe and life perilous.

"The owners of the great corporations whose plants were in and about East St. Louis lived in other cities. They pocketed their dividends without concern for the municipal dishonesty that wasted the taxes, and without a thought for the thousands of their own workmen, black and white, who lived in hovels, the victims of poverty and disease, of long hours and incessant labor.

"The greed that made crooks of the politicians made money grabbers of the manufacturers, who pitted white labor against black, drove organized labor from their plants, brought thousands of inefficient negroes from the South, crowding the white men from their positions. All this stirred the fires of race hatred until it finally culminated in bloody, pitiless riot, arson and wanton murder.

"Mayor Mollman surrounded himself with advisers who were familiar with the game of politics. They were not interested in securing an honest and economical administration. Their business first was to elect a man who would be subservient; one who possibly might not put his own hand into the public treasury, but would look the other way if a friend were so engaged. They needed a man who would stand between them and the indignant taxpayer; a fair promiser but a poor performer; personally honest, maybe, but so weak, so feeble, and so easily influenced that the conspirators were able to dictate his policies, and in the shadow of his stupidity loot the municipality. This was not the result of corruption in only one political party. It was brought about by a combination between the leaders of the worst elements in both parties. They pooled issues in the city election and declared regular dividends on their investment at the expense of honest people.

"In the history of corrupt politics in this country there never has been a more shameless debauchery of the electorate nor a more vicious alliance between the agencies and beneficiaries of crime than for years existed in East St. Louis. It is a disgraceful chapter. It puts an ineffaceable brand on every man engaged in the conspiracy. Its contamination, spreading from a reservoir of corruption in the city hall, filtered through carefully laid conduits into every street and alley; into the hotels where girls, mere children of 15 years of age, were violated; into the low dance halls where schoolgirls listened to lewd songs and engaged in lascivious dances, and in the interval retired to assignation rooms with the drunken brutes who frequented these resorts; into the gambling houses where poorly paid workmen were robbed of their daily earnings; into the 350 saloons which kept open on Sunday, many of them running without license; into the barrel houses, where the vilest of whisky was sold in bottles, the resort of vagrants and drunkards, rendezvous of criminals and schools of crime.

"This corruption palsied the hands of prominent officials whose duty it was to enforce the law. Lawyers became protectors of criminals; the courts were shields for the highwaymen, the prostitute, the gambler, the sneak thief and the murderer. The higher courts were not free from this baneful influence, which invaded all ranks and brought them to its low level.

"Local judges were found who would take straw bonds that the worst criminals might escape; exacting only costs, two-thirds going into the pockets of the judge and one-third into the waiting palm of the chief of police.

"A police force is never better than the police commissioner; and the police commissioners, in turn, reflect the character and wishes of the mayor. If a city has a mayor of courage and ability, who is not the weak and willing prey of political crooks and grafters, he is certain to appoint a board of police commissioners who will name policemen intelligent enough to know the law and brave and honest enough to enforce it.

"East St. Louis was doubly unfortunate. In the person of Mayor Mollman it had an executive who obeyed orders from a gang of conscienceless politicians of both political parties, who were exploiting the city for their own aggrandizement, careless alike of its good name, its security or its prosperity. They were harpies who closed their eyes to the corruption that saturated every department of the public service and fattened on its festering carcass. Without conscience and without shame they led the mayor into devious paths, tempted him with assurances of political support for his future ambitions, packed the police force with men whose incompetency was only surpassed by their venality, and so circumscribed him with flattery and encouraged his cupidity that they were able to take the reins of government from his feeble hands and guide it to suit their own foul and selfish purposes.

"The great majority of the police force appointed by Mayor Mollman's board of police commissioners had served an apprenticeship as connivers at corrupt elections; as protectors of lawless saloons, and hotels run openly as assignation houses. They turned criminals loose at the dictation of politicians, and divided with grafting justices of the peace the fines that should have gone into the treasury.

"This was the general character of the police force of the city of East St. Louis on July 1, 1917, when the spirit of lawlessness, long smoldering, burst into flame.

"When acts of violence were frequent on the night of May 28, after a largely attended public meeting in the City Hall at which Attorney Alexander Flannigan, by unmistakable implication, suggested mob violence, the police department failed to cope with the incipient mob.

"When the lawlessness began to assume serious proportions on July 2, the police instantly could have quelled and dispersed the crowds, then made up of small groups; but they either fled into the safety of a cowardly seclusion, or listlessly watched the depredations of the mob, passively and in many instances actively sharing in its work.

"The testimony of every witness who was free to tell the truth agreed in condemnation of the police for failure to even halfway do their duty. They fled the scene where murder and arson held full sway. They deserted the station house and could not be found when calls for help came from every quarter of the city. The organization broke down completely; and so great was the indifference of the few policemen who remained on duty that the conclusion is inevitable that they shared the lust of the mob for negro blood, and encouraged the rioters by their conduct, which was sympathetic when it was not cowardly.

"Some specific instances will be given in proof of the above conclusions:

"After a number of rioters had been taken to the jail by the soldiers under Col. Clayton, the police deliberately turned hundreds of them loose without bond, failing to secure their names or to make any effort to identify them.

"In one instance the mob jammed policemen against a building and held them there while other members of the gang were assaulting unoffending negroes. The police made no effort to free themselves, and seemed to regard the performance as highly humorous.

"The police shot into a crowd of negroes who were huddled together, making no resistance. It was a particularly cowardly exhibition of savagery.

"When the newspaper reporters were taking pictures of the mob, policemen charged them with their billies, broke their machines, destroyed the negatives, and threatened them with arrest if any further attempt was made to photograph the rioters who were making the streets run red with innocent blood, applying the torch to reach their victims who were cowering in their wretched homes.

"A negro was brutally clubbed by a policeman who found him guilty of the heinous offense of hiding in an ice box to save his life.

"Two policemen and three soldiers were involved in the shooting of Minneola McGee under circumstances of extreme brutality. This occurred, not at the scene of the riots, but as she was going from an outhouse to the kitchen of the residence where she was employed, when the police and the soldiers who accompanied them fired at her deliberately, without even the slightest provocation, and shot off her arm near the shoulder.

"Minneola McGee is a negro girl about 20 years old. She was induced to leave one of the Southern States and go to East St. Louis by the many enticing but misleading advertisements scattered among southern negroes. It is apparent that even before her injury she was a frail and rather delicate girl. When she appeared before your committee, with one arm off just below the shoulder, she was a physical wreck. She has no education whatever. It is not possible for her to earn a living in any other way than by manual labor. Now, as the result of as fiendish a piece of work as was ever perpetrated, she must, at least to some extent, be an object of charity. Because of her youth this sort of a life is before her. She was interrogated by your committee to ascertain whether it was possible for her to have been shot by accident. Her simple story removed all doubt upon that score, as she satisfied everyone who heard her that she was purposely and deliberately shot. In answer to questions put to her by your committee she said:

"I wuz in a outhouse in de garden. I hea'd de shootin' an' started fo' de house. When I got put'y nigh de house a soljer histed his gun and pinted it right at me and shot my arm off. Dar wuzn't nobody twixt me and de soljer fo' nim to be shootin' at, an' dar wuzn't nobody on de udder side of me for him to be shootin' at. He jist histed his gun and pinted it at me an' shot my arm off when I hadn't done nothin'. When he shot me I fell on de ground an' didn't know nothin'."

"Her pitiful recital of this piece of brutality toward her had the effect of stirring the indignation of everybody in the room where the hearing was being conducted, and at the same time to arouse the utmost sympathy for her.

"Many other cases of police complicity in the riots could be cited. Instead of being guardians of the peace they became a part of the mob by countenancing the assaulting and shooting down of defenseless negroes and adding to the terrifying scenes of rapine and slaughter.

"Their disgraceful conduct was the logical fruit of the notorious alliance between the City Hall and the criminal elements, aided by saloons, gambling houses and houses of prostitution. The city administration owed its election to their support and rewarded them for their fealty by permitting them to debauch the innocent, rob drunken victims, make assignation houses of the hotels, protect the gambler and the thief, and commit any act by which they might profit.

"Mayor Mollman appointed the police commissioners. He was responsible for their failure to divorce the police from its partnership with crooked lawyers, corrupt justices of the peace and notorious criminals. He knew full well what the conditions in the police department were. Prominent citizens had warned him repeatedly and had supplied convincing proof of their charges against the department. He paid no attention to their warnings and appeals. By his failure to remove the police commissioners he acquiesced in their misfeasance, and equally is responsible with them for the heartless crimes committed by an unrestrained mob, and for the lawlessness that was encouraged and fostered by his failure to enforce the law and to hold his subordinates responsible for the proper conduct of the police department.

"Much of the energy, some of the brains, and nearly all of the audacity of the gang that in recent years has held East St. Louis in its merciless grasp were centered in Locke Tarlton, president of the East Side Levee Board. It was his cunning mind that helped devise the schemes by which he and his associates were enriched. It was his practiced hand that carried them out. He made Mayor Mollman believe he was his creator; that he had elevated him to high station; and that his blind obedience to orders would mean rich political rewards in the future.

"As president of the levee board, Tarlton deposited millions in a local bank and exacted no interest from it. The taxpayers suffered, while the bank lent the money and pocketed the proceeds. In further proof of the close relationship that existed between the levee board and the bank, Thomas Gillespie, brother of the bank's president, was elected attorney for the levee board.

"Locke Tarlton knew how to handle the negro vote. He had an unanswerable argument to use with 'floaters.' He told them for whom he wanted them to vote, agreed on the price they were to get for casting their ballots, or rather having them marked for them by corrupt election officers, and always paid them promptly. Locke Tarlton was a man of honor when dealing with crooked voters. He always kept his word; he was sure pay. One of the picturesque sights in East St. Louis was to see Locke Tarlton with a stack of $5 bills in his hands publicly paying the negroes who helped him win an election.

"When the levee board needed a right of way over certain land that was owned by a widow, Dr. R. X. McCracken, the health commissioner appointed by Mayor Mollman, bought the land from the widow for $5,000 and sold it a few weeks later to his friends, the levee board, for $20,000. The widow did not know when she sold the land that the levee board wanted it. McCracken's wife also sold land in the same locality to the levee board for $600 an acre, while adjoining land was purchased for $300 an acre.

"When an organized effort was made to close the houses of prostitution the mayor would not give a definite answer until he had sent for Tarlton, who rented property in which low saloons with assignation and dance-hall attachments were featured. In the presence of Rev. George W. Allison, who was conducting this crusade, Tarlton was purposely profane and vulgar; betrayed his interest by his anxiety; showed no sympathy with the movement; said in the presence of the mayor that the 'town was full of jailbirds and crooks, and always would be.'

"Whenever profitable vice was imperiled Tarlton was always found ready to defend. The criminal element believed, as publicly expressed by them, 'that he owned the mayor body and breeches;' and they looked to Tarlton to save them from interference by the police and from prosecution by the courts. He kept his compact faithfully. They never called for help in vain; and on election days the ranks of crime and its immediate beneficiaries, the saloon, the gambling den and the house of prostitution, paid him back with compound interest.

"Locke Tarlton was aided in his work by Tom Canavan, superintendent of public improvements. They were partners in many enterprises. Their desires ran along the same lines; their minds met in countless devious plans for personal gain and political advantage. Canavan was not as bold an operator as Tarlton, but he was more subtle. Possibly he lacked the resistless energy that carried Tarlton over obstacles that would have deterred a more cautious man; but he was shrewd and resourceful, and found ways and means to accomplish his ends, and one of his principal agencies was Locke Tarlton. The mayor was another.

"Tarlton and Canavan were 'the men higher up.' They knew how far to go without taking a personal risk. They knew, too, who could be depended upon to put things over; and the courts and the police force were so organized that no real friend of the 'gang' ever suffered.

"After the riots Canavan is reported to have said: 'Something had to be done to the "niggers," or they would have taken the town.'

"Jerry Sullivan, the corporation counsel, who profited by the job which made the county drain a swamp which he and his friends had very recently bought, evidently with the knowledge that it would soon be drained at public expense, was either an understudy for Tarlton and Canavan, or he was farther back of the curtain. He tried to do in a lesser way what they did wholesale. So far as he could help the combination along in his official capacity, Jerry was willing and ready to serve.

"Alexander Flannigan, an attorney of some ability and no character, appears often in the record of the investigation. His speech to an excited crowd of workingmen in the auditorium of the city hall on the night of May 28 virtually advised them to kill and burn the houses of the negroes. He was not authorized to speak for those who went there to protest against the lawlessness which disgraced the city and the presence of thousands of negroes who, it is claimed, were taking the places of the white workmen, but his inflammatory speech caused many of his hearers to rush into the street and resort to acts of violence.

"Flannigan has long been a menace to decency and order in East St. Louis. He has made a specialty of defending the worst criminals; and, by a corrupt partnership with certain justices of the peace, whose decisions he directed, he was able to secure the release of scores of guilty gamblers, thieves, thugs and prostitutes. If the case required a jury, by connivance with the constables, he always secured a jury that would acquit.

"When efforts were made to indict him for complicity in naturalization frauds, his friend and associate, Hubert Schaumleffel, State's attorney, pleaded with the Federal authorities not to push the charge against him.

"Flannigan ought to be indicted for his incendiary speech to the workingmen. He was in full sympathy with the action of the mob. They followed his advice, and the scenes of murder and arson that ensued were the logical result of his utterances.

"It is the duty of the respectable members of the bar in East St. Louis to institute the necessary proceedings to deprive him of his license to practice law. Such as he make a mockery of justice and bring reproach on an honorable profession.

"Hubert Schaumleffel is the State's attorney for St. Clair County, his authority extending over East St. Louis. It was his duty to prosecute the criminals that made an interstate playground of that city. No disorderly saloon, no gambling house, no house of prostitution could have existed if he had raised a threatening finger. He held in his hand the moral destiny of this city of 90,000 people. Had he been a man of average moral courage, prompted by high motives and responsive to his oath of office, East St. Louis and its border towns would have escaped the maelstrom of vice that all but engulfed them.

"But Schaumleffel had no civic pride; he was devoid of character; he was the boon companion of the low and dissolute; the ready servant of scheming politicians; at heart a sympathizer with criminals whom he should have prosecuted relentlessly. A member of the Tarlton-Canavan corrupt machine, he rendered menial service to his masters. It is in evidence that before the city election, when Mollman was a candidate for mayor, with all the hopes and prospects of the gang centered on him, Schaumleffel called together the leaders among the negroes, those who controlled the vicious elements of their race, and were permitted to violate the law whenever they rendered proper service to his administration. He told them plainly that they had to vote for Mollman for mayor, and if they failed to support him he would close the gambling dens and the dance halls, the policy shops and the dice games, and the lid would be securely placed on an absolutely 'tight town.'

"Many other instances could be given of Schaumleffel's alliance with the worst elements. Alexander Flannigan relied on and was emboldened by his friendship; the lottery sharks in St. Clair County escaped indictment by his inaction; countless criminals went unwhipped of justice, either because he neglected his duty, was blind to offenses committed by his political supporters, or was so benumbed by drink that he did not have the intelligence to realize the enormity of his official omissions.

"Rev. Father Christopher Goelz testified that he went to see Schaumleffel in order to protest against the existence of a cockpit at Woodland Park, with its attendant scenes of beastly drunkenness and debauchery. He found the State's attorney as he was on his way to St. Louis to attend a prize fight, so drunk that he could not talk to him intelligently.

"The day of the riot, with the mob rushing through the streets, hundreds of houses in flames, and men, women and children victims of the rifle, pistol and the bludgeon, State's Attorney Hubert Schaumleffel staggered drunken along the way, heedless of the crimes that were being committed in his presence and callous to the cries of the injured and the dying.

"It is his habit to drink to excess. His infirmity is known to all. His love for liquor seems to have stripped him of all moral courage and manhood, and left him naked and unashamed.

"When will the authorities confront him with his official derelictions and his personal delinquencies, and take from him the high place which he has disgraced?

"Dan McGlynn is a leading lawyer of East St. Louis. He should not be linked too closely with the malodorous Alexander Flannigan, but he must have learned his code of ethics in the same school from which Flannigan graduated. As a member of the so-called 'Committee of One Hundred' McGlynn pretendedly was an indignant citizen, protesting vigorously against lawlessness, cooperating with the attorney general in the prosecution of the rioters and condemning every form of vice. He was so earnest (?) that he was named as a member of the executive committee of the 'Committee of One Hundred,' and the attorney general of the State accepted his assistance, took him into his confidence and consulted freely with him because of his conceded legal ability and his knowledge of local conditions.

"But a change came over Dan McGlynn and he saw another light—not from above as Paul saw it, but from below—a red and sulphurous light that led him into devious paths. The two policemen, Cornelius Meehan and James O'Brien, who, with three of Col. Tripp's soldiers, shot off Minneola McGee's arm and murdered two innocent negroes the morning after the riot, asked Dan McGlynn to defend them. On one side was his membership on the executive committee of the 'Committee of One Hundred' and his possession of important secrets of the prosecution disclosed to him by officials of the attorney general's office, and on the other was his desire to save Meehan and O'Brien from the punishment which they so justly deserved. All his talents and influence were placed at the service of these assassins, forgetting his duty as a citizen and regard for the ethics of his profession.

"He attempted to justify his conduct by the statement that the policemen were 'old clients' and he felt bound to defend them. Dan McGlynn, powerful, resourceful and respected; and Alexander Flannigan, corrupt and condemned, really are brothers under the skin.

"The case of a young woman, whose name for obvious reasons should not become a part of this report, brought from St. Louis to East St. Louis as a 'white slave' and held a prisoner in a saloon and rooming house run by Steve Unk and his wife, illustrates to what depths of depravity human beings can descend for money. This girl was but 17 years old. She met a man in St. Louis, whose name she did not know, but from her description was a 'pimp' whose business it was to secure 'white slaves' for the East St. Louis market. He told this girl that she was to get employment at the Star Hotel. He took her to Steve Unk's dive, where the first duty imposed upon her was to sit in the saloon and drink with low characters who frequented it. Unk next explained to her that it was her duty to go 'upstairs' with them, and whatever money she received as a prostitute would be divided, half to her and half to Mrs. Unk.

"In the course of time she became 'enceinte,' and Mrs. Unk herself took her to a midwife in St. Louis, who performed an abortion on her. She was taken back to Unk's place that afternoon, was so ill and weak she could not leave her room. Racked with pain and suffering tortures from the crude operation, she was forced to submit to Unk, who broke into her room and spent half the night with her.

"Day by day she sat in the back room of this low saloon, and far into the night, drinking with the mill hands and roustabouts who were drawn there by her advertised presence. She testified that she often drank as many as a dozen bottles of beer in a night, because Unk made her drink with all who asked her. Unk would not permit her to talk with anyone who spoke English, fearful that she would tell her story and appeal to them for help. Unk and his wife made it a rule that she could not have breakfast, not even a drink of water, until after she had made some money in the morning.

"When she finally got away from Unk's place to go to her home in St. Louis, they kept her clothes and her money, and refused to give her even the pitiful share which she had earned by prostitution with the motley gang that crowded this low saloon and assignation house.

"Mrs. Yent, who took the girl into her home at the request of the United States attorney until such time as a 'white slave' charge against Unk could be prosecuted, was hounded by the police, and finally arrested on a trumped-up charge of running a house of prostitution, because this unfortunate girl, sick almost unto death, and an attending nurse were in the house. She not only sheltered this poor girl, but nursed her tenderly, and for her act of charity was dragged into court and prosecuted; but, after a full investigation, the judge dismissed the charge against Mrs. Yent as without foundation.

"Since your committee left East St. Louis Steve Unk has been convicted and sent to the penitentiary for two years for his treatment of this girl. Mrs. Unk is yet to be tried.

"Joseph B. Messick is the county judge of St. Clair County. As judge he appoints two members of the board of review which has power to increase or reduce all assessments made by the city assessor and county officials. He also appoints the election board, and that board made his son its secretary. This young man is a lawyer of limited capacity, with an earning power of perhaps a hundred dollars a month, but his profound (?) knowledge of the law appealed to some of the great corporations of St. Clair County, and they at once employed him as attorney to appear before his father's board of review to secure for them a reduction in their assessments. Young Messick rapidly developed an insight into assessment values, and proved conclusively that from their standpoint his selection was wise.

"The board of review was composed of William A. Swartztrauber, Frank M. Miller, with powerful political connections, and Charles F. Krebs.

"It did not take the son of the county judge long to convince this board, appointed by his father, that the assessments made by the city assessor and increased by the county assessor were an unjust burden on some of these rich corporations.

"Here are the assessments and reductions of the leading corporations:

"St. Louis Bridge Co., assessed at $3,500,000, which included only the east half of Eads Bridge, was reduced to $2,500,000, although for the four years previous it had been assessed at $3,150,000.

"The Aluminum Co. of America was assessed by Assessor O'Day at $699,990. Assessor Warning raised it to $799,990, and the board of review, perhaps after an eloquent appeal by young Messick, cut it to $200,000.

"Ninety-four lots owned by the Wiggins Ferry Co. were assessed at $1,518,470. This assessment was cut by the board to $803,245. The assessment of these lots was cut virtually in half by the board; and in some other instances the board reduced the Wiggins properties, but left unchanged the assessments on adjacent lots owned by others.

"The plant of the Malleable Iron Co. was assessed at $465,000. It was raised by Warning, the county assessor, to $519,000 and was cut by the board to $132,000.

"The American Steel Foundries' assessment was reduced about $38,000.

"The Republic Iron & Steel Co.'s assessment was reduced from $63,990 to $16,788.

"The Elliott Frog & Switch Co. was reduced from $24,420 to $9,000.

"Lots owned by the Water Co., assessed at $9,660, were reduced by the board to $2,220.

"These assessments held for four years, and during that period the St. Louis Bridge Co. would save in taxes $116,654, the Wiggins Ferry Co. $84,140, the Aluminum Co. of America $69,952, and the Malleable Iron Co. $45,148.

"Although the assessment of virtually every big corporation in and around East St. Louis was reduced, assessments of very many of the small householders were increased.

"Your committee is not informed just what fee was paid to young Messick for appearing as attorney before the board appointed by his father.

"The strike in the plant of the Aluminum Ore Co. was caused by a demand on the part of organized labor for an adjustment of wages, a reduction in hours and an improvement of conditions under which the men worked. The company refused to meet any of these demands, declined to discuss the matter with the workmen's committee, and added insult to injury by importing negro strike breakers and giving them the places of the white men.

"It is not the purpose of your committee to discuss the merits of this controversy, although the bringing of negroes to break a strike which was being peaceably conducted by organized labor sowed the dragon's teeth of race hatred that afterwards grew into the riot which plunged East St. Louis into blood and flame.

"But there grew out of this strike a violation of the law of such a reckless and defiant nature that it calls for the severest condemnation.

"One E. M. Sorrels was secretary of an alleged rifle club which never had maintained more than a desultory organization. The members virtually had ceased to use a temporary range; but there were stored in the club house a number of rifles and thousands of rounds of ammunition, the property of the United States. Sorrels, either on his own initiative or at the suggestion of an officer of the Aluminum Ore Co., entered the storeroom of the rifle club at midnight and secretly transferred to the plant of the Aluminum Co. between 30 and 40 rifles and hundreds of rounds of ammunition; the purpose being to arm the strike breakers and turn guns of the United States against the forces of organized labor and shoot down the strikers should this be necessary to break the strike.

"Sorrels violated the law by burglarizing the house containing these rifles; but the Aluminum Ore Co. recognized the risk he had taken; and, grateful for the unlawful service he had rendered, promptly took him into its employ at a salary of $175 a month.

"The War Department should not be blamed when United States rifles and ammunition are stolen and turned over to a private corporation to be put to unlawful uses; but the attention of the Secretary of War is invited to Sorrells's criminal act, and he should request the United States district attorney to have him indicted and prosecuted to conviction.

"The character of the police force and its utter demoralization was strikingly shown in the murder of H. B. Trafton, head of the 'morality squad' of the police force, by Assistant Chief of Detectives Frank Florence. The murder grew out of the fact that Trafton, acting under orders and in the line of his duty, raided a house of prostitution which, to the astonishment of the community, turned out to be owned by Florence. When they met Florence drew his weapon; Trafton threw both hands up above his head; but nevertheless Florence shot and killed him in cold blood. Florence was indicted and tried, but being one of the 'gang' was, of course, acquitted.

"One of the worst crimes ever committed in St. Clair County was the abduction and murder of Alphonso Magarian, 3-year-old son of an Armenian baker. The father of the child complained to the police that a house of prostitution was being conducted next door to his home. Soon thereafter his child disappeared, no trace of it being found until nine days later, when the little headless body was discovered 100 yards away in a dump heap. The head was found a week later in another dump heap. Several pimps and two prostitutes from the house next door were arrested, and one of the women confessed to having assisted in abducting the child. Many threats had been made against her by friends of the accused. Before the trial her mangled corpse was found on a railroad track. A coroner's verdict of suicide was rendered, but it is believed she was first murdered and then placed on the track.

"Strong 'gang' influence was used to save the indicted men, one of whom was a relative of Health Commissioner McCracken. State's Attorney Schaumleffel conducted the prosecution, and again, as a matter of course, there was a verdict of acquittal. The house of prostitution complained of by the father of the murdered child was in a building owned by Thomas Canavan, president of the board of local improvements, and Locke Tarlton, president of the levee board.

"The offenses committed against law, order and decency in East St. Louis and St. Clair County include every known act in the catalogue of crime. We have selected some of the high lights that luridly illumine the landscape of crime.

"One-third of all the stealing from freight cars engaged in interstate commerce, as reported from 27 States, was done in East St. Louis and St. Clair County. It was not only a fertile field for the car thief, but he found a ready sale for his plunder through agencies that were protected by the police and other officials.

"Thousands of dollars' worth of stolen goods were found in the stable of a notorious saloon keeper, who took a prominent part in politics, and he was indicted. There was conclusive evidence of his guilt; but, as was to be expected in that community, many leading officials went to his rescue and testified to his good character. Again, there was a verdict of acquittal.

"The politicians and the police force of East St. Louis and St. Clair County divided among themselves at least $60,000 a year in graft which they exacted from the gamblers and prostitutes for protection.

"Constables and deputy sheriffs picked up some easy money in the vile dance halls that were open on Sunday in the various saloons in St. Clair County. They were each paid $5 a day by proprietors of these places under the pretense of maintaining order, but under their oaths they should have arrested and prosecuted the keepers and all those present for violating the law.

"Records show that more than 300 girls between the ages of 13 and 16 years visited the dance halls run in connection with saloons and so-called hotels, which were in reality assignation houses. These children, their hair hanging down their backs, and in short dresses, publicly engaged in lascivious dances with a motley crew of drunken toughs. The police took no notice of these offenses, nor did the mayor make any effort to close these joints notoriously violating the law.

"A poor widow who had three daughters appealed to Rev. George W. Allison to prosecute the men responsible for their downfall. All of them were ruined in these dance halls. The youngest, 15 years old, visited a saloon one night and was taken to a room in the building and outraged, and nine different men satisfied their lust before a well-known saloon keeper arrived on the scene, when he locked the door and spent the remainder of the night with the despoiled child. There were no indictments, no prosecutions, and no attempts on the part of the police or mayor to arrest the offenders, notwithstanding that officers of the law were eyewitnesses.

"The knowledge of this horrible assault became so widespread that a former State's attorney finally secured an affidavit from the victim, but he went out of office, and the remaining authorities paid no attention to it. Finally, however, some of those involved in the outrage sent the 15-year-old child to California where she gave birth to a boy baby. The name of the saloon keeper who participated in the assault was given to Mayor Mollman, but he made no effort to have him indicted, and even refused to cancel his saloon license.

"A well-known hotel in East St. Louis, with a saloon attachment, was offered for sale, and part of the chattels as set out in writing in the contract were two women, whose earnings as prostitutes it was represented would average $7 a day each. The owner of this hotel lived in New York, and Canavan and Tarlton, both public officials, acting as his agents, rented the property. The vile purpose for which it was used was held out as a reason why the place was worth the price asked.

"Between the 1st of September, 1916, and July 2, 1917, the day of the riot, there were eight hundred crimes of various characters, ranging from larcency to rape and murder, committed in East St. Louis. In hundreds of cases these straw bonds were taken and when the criminals failed to answer a small fine was entered, of which the justice of the peace received two-thirds and the chief of police one-third. It was a profitable business for the justices, one of whom, now dead, is said to have made $25,000 in one year.

"Women of the street in kimonas, with frowsy heads and painted faces, took part in the riots and were, if possible, more brutal than the men. They attacked negro women and children and beat them unmercifully.

"The mayor's secretary made a practice of instructing justices of the peace when to fine criminals; how much they should pay; and also furnished a list of those who were to go free.

"It is worthy of note that with the aid of the votes of the good women East St. Louis now has a commission form of government, which promises to cure some of the evils from which it has suffered for so many years.

"One of the unique features of official life in East St. Louis was that permitting constables to summon juries from the barrel houses and saloons. They were known as 'irrigation juries.' These juries always returned a verdict in favor of the clients of Alexander Flannigan, a friend of the court, or of any other lawyer or gang leader with 'pull;' and it was the invariable custom for the court to impose a sufficient additional fine to pay for a 'treat' all around for the jurymen and officers. These lawyers with a 'pull' proudly took them to a nearby saloon on which was the large sign, 'Court Bar,' where they were 'irrigated.'

"As a matter of record many of the prominent citizens of East St. Louis and many not so prominent refused to pay taxes; and then, under the law, their property was sold. In all such cases the city bought in the property, but never perfected its title, with the result that these taxes were finally barred by the statute of limitation, the city receiving no revenue and the tax dodger retaining his property.

"The saloons made a business of discounting the salaries of city employees, in many cases charging as high as 30 and even 40 per cent. The tougher the saloon the more patrons it had from the city hall.

"A saloon keeper was chairman of one of the assessment boards. He publicly stated that the corporations were assessed too high and the small property owners too low.

"After Mayor Mollman's election, which was brought about by an alliance between corrupt Republican and Democratic gangsters of both races, he was the guest of honor at a banquet given by negroes, and was photographed in the midst of them.

"A witness stated that one of the letters written by a negro to his friend in the South ran about as follows: 'There is a money tree in East St. Louis. All you have to do is to come up here and shake it and get the money.' The negroes came in thousands in answer to this appeal and others like it. They found no money tree; but, instead, some of them found telephone poles from which they were hung at a rope's end.

"During the riot a negro was arrested and taken to jail, that the mob might not get him. He had not committed any offense; and, presumably, was in the safe custody of the jailer. One of the police officers, learning that he had some money in his pocket, constituted himself judge, jury and witness, and fined him $11.50 and also made him contribute $5 additional to raise the assessment of one of his fellow prisoners to the proper amount. This petty crook, in learning afterwards that the negro had some change left, no doubt was surprised at his own moderation.

"One of the famous institutions of Brooklyn, a negro town in St. Clair County, was known as 'Aunt Kate's Honkytonk.' A sign over the door read, 'Something doing every hour.' Many witnesses testified that Aunt Kate was protected by the police, and that her place was vile, even in that degraded community. Indecent dances went on as a continuous performance, and abandoned white women interlined the motley crowd of men by dancing naked on the ball-room floor.

"One of the original dances of 'Aunt Kate's Honkytonk' was the 'Chemise-she-wobble,' a variation of the famous muscle dance of the East. It was a special feature of Aunt Kate's program, and hundreds came from all the countryside to witness it.

"Brooklyn had a high school for negro girls, in which the town took a pardonable pride; but along came a wave of crime and engulfed this center of culture, and 24 out of the 25 girls who were in the graduating class went to the bad in the saloons and dance halls and failed to receive their diplomas.

"It was a frequent occurrence to find drunken, naked white women in the streets of Brooklyn. They had spent the night in the saloons; and, in the quarrels and orgies that took place, were stripped and turned into the street.

"Marie Hall is a noted prostitute in East St. Louis. She not only had a 'pull' with the police, but she was a great admirer of Justice Clark, and presented him with a new office desk, to which he proudly pointed. When joked by his friends about this gift he remarked he was only sorry she had not given him an automobile instead.

"Some years ago the council of East St. Louis gave away an electric franchise to a crowd of freebooters who had neither capital nor credit. They never had any idea of establishing an electric plant nor using any of the valuable privileges so freely granted them. These promoters sold the franchise for $50,000, and ever since East St. Louis has suffered from high prices for electricity, an eastern syndicate finally getting control, paying hundreds of thousands of dollars for the charter. The widow of one of the aldermen exposed the bribery by which the franchise was secured. She filed suit against the original promoters for $1,000, alleging that $14,000 had been promised for the votes of 14 aldermen; that they had lived up to their part of the contract and granted the franchise, and that her husband died before he could receive his share of the boodle—$1,000.

"The looting of the city and county treasury has grown into a habit in East St. Louis. More than $250,000 has been stolen by various defaulting officials in the last five years. In one instance the school fund was robbed of $45,000, but the prosecution of the thief has gone on listlessly for several years without any real effort to convict him. He was not arraigned for trial until after your committee had left East St. Louis. He then pleaded guilty. Everybody knows who were protecting him, but so many similar thefts have been overlooked that there is but little public sentiment against him.

"After one of the defalcations the thieves took everything in the vault but the metal hinges of a loose-leaf ledger, and the fire they started to destroy the evidence of their guilt left that as the only souvenir for the taxpayers.

"The names of the saloons in and about East St. Louis were typical of the wildest West in the mining-camp days; and, while picturesque in their nomenclature, they breathe a spirit of lawless defiance. Prominent among them were 'The Bucket of Blood,' 'The Monkey Cage,' 'The Yellow Dog,' 'Uncle John's Pleasure Palace,' with the seductive appeal, 'Come in and be suited,' and 'Aunt Kate's Honkytonk,' with 'Something doing every hour.'

"In the latter part of 1912 or the first part of 1913 a hod carrier living in East St. Louis died. It was not then known that he had any near relatives, although he carried $1,600 life insurance. The county took charge and the funeral was assigned to William Degen, an undertaker, who was a member of the city council. A relative of the deceased appeared later and claimed the insurance. It was found that all the money had been paid to Degen except about $200. Degen supplied an itemized bill, containing such items as $800 for a casket, $100 for a suit of clothes, $20 for shoes, $5 for shaving the dead man, and other and similar extravagant items.

"The whole matter was exposed in the St. Louis Post-Dispatch, and such a scandal resulted that the authorities exhumed the body. It was found to have been buried in a rough pine box, with scarcely enough clothing to cover it. The whole outfit cost less than $50.

"It was reported at about the same time that the bodies of women were not safe from the degeneracy of an employee of another prominent undertaker. Another employee of this establishment reported one such instance to his employer and was discharged, while the man against whom the accusation was made was retained in the employ of the undertaker.

"On the night of July 1 Mayor Mollman telephoned the acting adjutant general of Illinois that the mob spirit was rampant; that the police were unable to cope with the situation; and that it would take the strong hand of the militia to preserve order.

At 8 o'clock next morning Col. S. O. Tripp, assistant quartermaster general, arrived under orders from the office of the adjutant general of the State. After an unnecessary journey to St. Louis he came to the city hall in East St. Louis and reported for duty to the mayor, who described the situation to him and gave him entire charge to deal with the conditions as the necessities of the case might arise.

"It may be well at this point to describe Col. Tripp, because he fills an important rôle in this tragedy, and responsibility for much that was done and left undone must rest on him.

"When the adjutant general's office summoned Col. Tripp in the early hours of the morning he answered the call to duty arrayed in a seersucker suit and a dainty straw hat, after having, as he informed your committee, hastily packed his hand bag with a lot of toilet articles. Thus ready for any emergency he took the first train for East St. Louis. He brought no uniform with him and, although it was his duty to face and quell a riotous mob, at no time was he garbed as a soldier.

"Evidently it was his intention to secure some bullet-proof coign of vantage from which he could view the turbulent scenes in perfect safety; while, with a megaphone, he could command and dispose of his troops. After hours of consultation with his companion in timidity and inefficiency, the mayor, he ventured in the direction of the mob and, according to his own testimony, saw a helpless negro, with a rope around his neck, being dragged to his death.

"He described, with a great show of courage, how he grabbed a gun from a soldier and, facing this terrible mob, pressed back 1,500 people by his own unaided effort. Your committee was unable to find any evidence to confirm this valiant deed of the redoubtable colonel, where he practically mastered hundreds of infuriated rioters; but, as he states it to be a fact, it must be true.

"It is the unanimous opinion of every witness who saw Col. Tripp on that fateful day that he was a hindrance instead of a help to the troops; that he was ignorant of his duties, blind to his responsibilities and deaf to every intelligent appeal that was made to him. His presence in East St. Louis was a reproach to the assistant adjutant general, who sent him there, and a reflection on the judgment of the governor for burdening his staff with so hopeless an incompetent. Instead of putting himself at the head of his troops, uniformed as a soldier, and going boldly into the mob, dispersing them and, if necessary, risking his own life to rescue the poor wretches who were dragged through the streets by the neck, shot and mutilated, he remained in the city hall from 8 a. m. until 12 o'clock, when he calmly repaired to a restaurant outside the danger zone, secured a delightful lunch which it took him more than an hour to order and masticate, and at 1.30 he resumed his survey of the situation from the safe shelter of the city hall.

"When Col. Tripp was asked why he spent four hours in the city hall, with East St. Louis in the hands of a murderous mob, and failed to go to the scenes of conflict and take charge of his troops who were sorely in need of a commander, he absolved himself of all responsibility by answering, 'The President never goes out of his office'; and so, by comparing himself to the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, he was perfectly satisfied with his conduct. 'Me and the President' was, in his opinion, a complete defense.

"The mayor called the governor on the long-distance telephone and urged that additional troops be sent, saying that the lives and property of the citizens were endangered. But Col. Tripp assured the governor that he 'had the situation well in hand,' and that there was no need for more troops. His judgment in this matter was no better than his ability and courage as a soldier; qualities which he totally lacked.

"Your committee desires to speak a special word in commendation of the conduct, bravery and skill of Col. C. B. Clayton, of the Fourth Infantry, next in command to Col. Tripp. Had it not been for his promptness and determination the mob certainly would have committed many more atrocities.

"Col. Tripp, in his testimony before your committee, undertook to defend his blunders; but he failed utterly. If he had taken hold of the situation upon his arrival, inspired his soldiers with respect for him, gone to the center of the disturbance and turned loaded guns against the mob, he would have spared East St. Louis much of the ignominy from which it now suffers and saved the lives of many innocent men, women and children.

"Your committee invites the attention of the Secretary of War to the record of this officer as set forth under oath by himself and many other witnesses.

"The conduct of the soldiers who were sent to East St. Louis to protect life and property puts a blot on that part of the Illinois militia that served under Col. Tripp. They were scattered over the city, many of them being without officers to direct or control them. In only a few cases did they do their duty. They seemed moved by the same spirit of indifference or cowardice that marked the conduct of the police force. As a rule they fraternized with the mob, joked with them and made no serious effort to restrain them.

"Following are a few of many incidents testified to by responsible witnesses:

"A negro, unarmed, making no resistance, and trying to escape the fury of the mob, was knocked down and cruelly kicked and beaten. His condition was so pitiable that a soldier said to the rioters, 'Boys, he has suffered enough; let him alone.' For answer one of the mob drew his pistol and shot the negro five times, one bullet plowing through his brain. The soldier then put his gun on his shoulder and calmly walked away, making no arrests.

"A number of soldiers openly stated that 'they didn't like niggers' and would not disturb a white man for killing them.

"Three soldiers and two policemen were ordered to close a negro saloon. On their approach two negro men ran, and the soldiers and policemen shot and killed both, although neither had committed any offense.

"The same crowd shot off the arm of the negro servant girl, Minneola McGee, already mentioned. They had no warrant for her; she had not committed any offense; she was not even running away. She was cruelly maimed for life by these official murderers. This unoffending girl was wantonly shot by the soldiers, as testified to by the policemen who have been prosecuted. Your committee was unable to secure the names of these militiamen. They must be known to the military authorities. It is the duty of the governor and the adjutant general of Illinois to find these men and to punish them for their brutal crime. It was one of the most flagrant cases of cruelty revealed to your committee.

"Paul Y. Anderson, reporter for the St. Louis Post-Dispatch, testified that he heard a soldier tell a white man who was loading a revolver 'to kill all the negroes he could, that he didn't like them, either.'

"A member of the Sixth Illinois Infantry boasted that he had fired his gun 17 times during the riot and every time at a 'black target.' Your committee was unable to secure the name of this soldier.

"It was a common expression among the soldiers: 'Have you got your nigger yet?'

"A militiaman in uniform, said to have been on furlough, led a section of the mob that was killing negroes.

"A soldier stabbed a white boy with a bayonet, and the boy bled to death. The boy was carrying a pair of pantaloons across his arm. That was his sole offense. The soldier was drinking and murderously assaulted him. After a full hearing the coroner's jury unanimously held him on a charge of murder. But, later, at a secret trial by the military authorities, he was released.

"Soldiers deliberately shot into a house where seven negroes had taken shelter.

"G. E. Popkess, a reporter for the St. Louis Times, testified that he saw two inoffensive negroes, while fleeing for their lives from a burning building, shot down by soldiers.

"The governor of Illinois has a responsibility in this matter that he can not evade. The militia of the State are under his control. He can arraign militiamen for misconduct; he can remove officers for inefficiency; he can institute a thorough inquiry that will expose the criminal and the incompetent.

"A prominent merchant of East St. Louis testified that within 24 hours after the occurrence he notified the governor of the case of a militiaman who deliberately shot a negro without provocation, a crime committed in cold blood. He did not know the militiaman's name, but it was possible for the governor to learn who he was and to visit proper punishment upon him.

"The governor must be familiar with the wanton stabbing of the boy by a drunken soldier. The facts were reported at the time in all the newspapers as they were testified to before your committee. They are within the reach of the governor in the records of the court-martial which is said to have tried and released this murderer.

"Has any official effort been made to apprehend the three militiamen who next morning after the riot, in company with two policemen, killed two innocent negroes and shot off the arm of the negro girl, Minneola McGee? These men were State militiamen, were in regulation uniform, and subject to the authorities of the great State of Illinois. At that time it would have been an easy matter to identify them and turn them over to the authorities to be tried for their crimes. It is evident that no military inquiry conducted by such courts-martial as sat in similar cases growing out of the East St. Louis riots would have given them their deserts.

"What was to hinder the proper State authorities from making an investigation of this murderous assault? They had the power to search the roster of the companies present at East St. Louis. These men were known to their companions, who could have identified them easily.

"Special commendation is due Attorney General Brundage and Assistant Attorney General Middlekauf. The attorney general answered every appeal made to him by the good people of East St. Louis and St. Clair County and, virtually without assistance from the local authorities, remedied many evils. It was due entirely to his efforts that lawless resorts were closed, and wherever there had been a violation of the State law he was quick to order the arrest and prosecution of the offender.

"Assistant Attorney General Middlekauf had active charge of the prosecutions growing out of the riot, and he showed neither fear nor favor. Capable, determined and courageous, he allowed neither political influence nor personal appeals to swerve him from the strict line of duty.

"As a result of these prosecutions by the attorney general's office 11 negroes and 8 white men are in the State penitentiary; 2 additional white men have been sentenced to prison terms; 14 white men have been given jail sentences; 27 white men, including the former night chief of police and 3 policemen, have pleaded guilty to rioting and have been punished.

"These convictions were obtained in the face of organized, determined effort, backed with abundant funds, to head off the prosecutions and convictions. In the case of Mayor Mollman there seems to have been an open, paid advertising campaign to slander and intimidate the attorney general.

"The State of Illinois is fortunate in having men of ability and character at the head of its law department.

"Your committee wishes to commend the work of Rev. George W. Allison, pastor of the First Baptist Church, of East St. Louis, and to express thanks to him for much information which was of vital assistance in bringing out the criminal life of the city and the political influence that encouraged lawlessness. The Rev. Allison is a man of courage, capacity and determination. Conspiracies against his character and threats against his life did not deter him; the constant danger of bodily harm did not prevent him from continuing his investigations and fighting with all his splendid power the organized forces of evil. If there had been others on the 'Committee of One Hundred' with even half his moral force the example might have leavened that whole lot of selfish incompetents.

"Paul Y. Anderson, reporter of the St. Louis Post-Dispatch, was assigned during the past three years to duty in East St. Louis, and was to your committee an inexhaustible source of valuable information. In serving his newspaper fearlessly he rendered the public a more important service by laying bare the story of faithless officials who could not be lashed, even by exposure, to do their duty. He personally laid before the mayor positive evidence of the guilt and incompetency of his police force, and demanded that he close the gambling houses and the lawless and unlicensed saloons. His investigations, thwarted on every hand, were thorough and trustworthy. He saw everything; reported what he saw without fear of consequences; defied the indignant officials whom he charged with criminal neglect of duty; ran a daily risk of assassination, and rendered an invaluable public service by his exposures. His testimony before your committee was most interesting and illuminating; his harrowing experiences before and during the riot threw a flood of light on conditions.

"Your committee is indebted to Rev. Father Christopher Goelz, pastor of St. Phillips Church, at Edgemont, for much valuable information. He was a power for good in his community, and the fact that it escaped much of the contamination of the greater city was due to his vigilance and the publicity he gave the low characters that attempted to gain a foothold in Edgemont.

"Your committee has not adjourned sine die for the reason that it is possible, at least, that a supplementary report may be made showing the beneficial results of the exposures brought about by the investigation and also by the vigorous prosecutions hereinbefore referred to.

"All of which is respectfully submitted.

"BEN JOHNSON.

The SPEAKER pro tempore [Mr. GARNER]. On this call 242 Members have answered to their names. A quorum is present and the Doorkeeper will open the doors.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for 10 minutes to make a statement.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks to proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, for two or three weeks practically the entire membership of this House has evidenced a great desire to adjourn for 30 days while the Ways and Means Committee was working on the revenue bill. It was perfectly evident that the Ways and Means Committee would not be able to report a bill for the consideration of the House until some time around August 12. I also understood, as we all understood, that a large majority in the Senate was favorable to this adjournment. Before coming to any conclusion, before assuring the House that we would adjourn, or would probably adjourn, I thought it best to take the matter up with the President. I asked Senator MARTIN and Senator SIMMONS to go with me, believing it was due to the President before we took it up to confer with him and ascertain whether he had any important legislation that he desired to have passed in the meantime.

We did confer with the President, went over the whole legislative situation, and the President gave his consent and approval to the adjournment, and practically everybody, so far as I knew, at that time approved of the adjournment, both in the Senate and in the House.

Since then the question of Government control and operation of the telegraph and the telephone companies arose. It was in the President's mind and in the minds of a great many Members of Congress and others that the time had come when for the successful prosecution of the war the President should take charge and supervise these wires and telephones. The House, after several days' hearing on the part of the committee, reported the bill out and the House promptly passed it. It went to the Senate. The question was whether the Senate could pass the bill promptly, and if not, how long a time it would take for the Senate to consider it in the committee and in the Senate.

It was believed that if the Senate would take up the bill immediately and proceed with its consideration, the House could not think of the question of a recess until it was disposed of. Before the Senate took any action to-day upon the question of the recess, Senators SIMMONS and MARTIN and myself at 3.30 o'clock this afternoon had a conference with the President. He told us that he thought the passage of the telegraph and telephone legislation was one of vital importance; that he was very anxious to see the resolution pass at the earliest day possible; and that he was in hopes the Senate would take it up at once and pass it.

The Senators present then told the President in all probability it would take the Commerce Committee of the Senate at least three or four weeks before it could get it into the Senate for consideration, and it then would take some time for the Senate to consider it. They asked the President under the circumstances whether he would give his express consent to the recess. The President said that he could not; that it was not for him to decide. He said that his anxiety and desire were that the telegraph resolution should be passed at the earliest moment possible; that he did not know what the situation in the Senate was, but that if these gentlemen stated the situation correctly, and he did not doubt that they had, then, if in their judgment, if in the judgment of the Senate, if in the judgment of the Commerce Committee of the Senate the recess would quicken and facilitate action by the committee and consideration of the resolution in the Senate, there could be no objection to such adjournment. He said that it was with the Senate to decide the question. Senator MARTIN assured the President that they would not put the question of adjournment before the Senate unless they could secure the pledge of the Commerce Committee of the Senate to stay in session during the recess, if we were to take one, and begin as early as possible hearings and work on the resolution. Members of the Commerce Committee, as I understood Senator MARTIN and Senator SIMMONS, had told them that hearings were necessary.

The President impressed upon us the importance of doing that which would facilitate action of the committee and the Senate on the telegraph resolution. The President's concern and desire were to pass this most important and vital resolution, and that it should be passed at the earliest time possible, and he desired that course to be pursued which would accomplish this.

Senator MARTIN returned to the Capitol and got the members of the Commerce Committee of the Senate, who were in the city, together, a majority of the committee being present, and it seemed to be the sense of the committee—I was present—that a recess or adjournment for 30 days might probably facilitate and expedite the action of the committee and would get the bill before the Senate for consideration earlier, or equally as early, than if Congress was in session. They took the position that if the committee would, as they had pledged themselves to do, sit in Washington and begin hearings with a full day before them, without being called to the Senate on roll calls and for the consideration of other business, they could do more work during the recess in the same length of time than if the Congress were in session.

The Senate to-night passed a resolution for a recess by a majority of one.

Mr. SIMS. How many votes were cast?

Mr. KITCHIN. I do not know. It was carried by one majority.

Mr. SIMS. It was a vote of 27 to 26.

Mr. KITCHIN. It was the belief of the Commerce Committee, before which this telegraph resolution is pending, that it would quicken the passage if we took a recess. Mr. Speaker, while until just recently I felt sure that an overwhelming majority of the House was under the circumstances in favor of the 30 days' adjournment, and so told Senators, I further told Senator MARTIN and other Senators that the House would promptly pass the adjournment resolution when the Senate sent it over. I am convinced now that in spite of this the situation presents itself in such a way that a large majority of the House is now opposed to adjournment. At this apparent change of attitude, as I regarded it, I must confess surprise. I therefore propose to withdraw the resolution of recess, but before doing so let me make one personal reference. I have no personal interest in the recess adjournment, and I never considered it in connection with my personal convenience or interest. As dearly as I would love to go back to my own people and look them in the face and shake their hands and talk with them and be with them for a period of 30 days, even if we had taken the recess it would have been impossible for me to do so. It would have meant to me harder work and closer confinement. I would have been able and compelled to work three or four more hours a day upon the revenue bill than I possibly can with the House in session. To take the recess would have meant more hours of work upon the revenue bill for every single day of the recess, not only to me but to the other members of the Ways and Means Committee. I am confident that before the telegraph legislation arose the sentiment of nine-tenths of the Members on both sides of the aisle was most favorable for a recess of 30 days after, of course, the passage of the war measures and appropriation bills. I feel that it is due myself to make the statement to the House that as far as the recess is concerned it is of no personal interest or convenience to me. I was only interested in it for the membership of the House and because I felt sure that you gentlemen, after passage of the war measures and appropriation bills, desired it, as I knew you deserved it.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. In just a moment. Having said this much, Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my motion.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

SEVERAL MEMBERS. I object.

The SPEAKER. Several Members object.

Mr. SIMS. One would have been enough.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 10 o'clock and 2 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Monday, July 8, 1918, at 12 o'clock noon.

To this end do Thou guide us and bless us this day. For Christ's sake. Amen.

Mr. WALSH. I inquire of the Senator from South Carolina if he has the statute before him authorizing the appointment by the governor of South Carolina?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. In 1914, I have been informed. Our statute provides that the governor may appoint for not exceeding six months, and in the interim he must provide for an election.

Mr. WALSH. It was an act of the legislature?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Yes, sir; an act of the legislature.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The credentials will be placed on file. The newly appointed Senator from South Carolina will present himself at the desk and the oath of office will be administered to him.

Mr. BENET was escorted to the Vice President's desk by Mr. SMITH of South Carolina; and the oath prescribed by law having been administered to him, he took his seat in the Senate.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills and joint resolution, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

H. R. 8839. An act for the establishment of Oswego, in the State of New York, as a port of entry for immediate transportation without appraisement of dutiable merchandise;

H. R. 12002. An act for the establishment of Bar Harbor, in the State of Maine, as a port of entry and delivery for the immediate transportation without appraisement of dutiable merchandise; and

H. J. Res. 313. Joint resolution providing for the disposition of moneys represented in the Alfred Bernard Nobel peace prize, awarded in 1906.

The message also announced that the House agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 12229) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I send to the desk two telegrams which I wish to have read. The names of the senders may be omitted from the telegrams in reading.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Secretary will read the telegrams.

The Secretary read as follows:

DULUTH, MINN., July 6, 1918.

Hon. FRANK KELLOGG,
Senate, Washington, D. C.:

The undersigned operating employees of the Western Union Telegraph Co. at Duluth absolutely and unequivocally deny Mr. Konenkamp's statement that he is acting for us in the calling of a strike on July 8. His organization has no representative in this office whatsoever. His assertion that 25,000 telegraphers will cease work July 8 is a pipe dream, pure and simple. We believe that our first duty is the winning of the war, and refuse to be a party to anything that might prove to be an obstruction to that end. This sentiment we believe to be general among telegraph employees throughout the country. We have faith in the honesty and progressiveness of our company officials, and the proposed association of Western Union employees has the united support of all.

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN., July 6, 1918.

Hon. FRANK B. KELLOGG,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

The employees of the Western Union Telegraph Co. at Minneapolis, numbering over 600, wish to inform you that the Commercial Telegraphers' Union of America, or any other outside organization, do not represent them, and that they will prove themselves loyal to their country and company at this critical time.

EMPLOYEES WESTERN UNION TELEGRAPH CO.

Mr. KELLOGG. I have like telegrams from the employees of the telegraph companies in St. Paul, but I shall not ask to have them printed in the RECORD.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I have received a great many telegrams similar to those that have just been read into the RECORD, not only from my own State but from other States. I have not felt like having them read into the RECORD because I think the employees of the Western Union Telegraph Co., from one end of the country to the other, take the same position that is outlined in the telegrams that have just been read.

I simply wanted to make this statement to show that the telegrams I have received from all parts of the State bear the same message as those which were read.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I desire to corroborate what the Senator from Utah has said. I have received a great number of telegrams from the employees of the Western Union and other telegraph companies in Pennsylvania and all over the United States, stating that they are in no sympathy whatever with the proposition of a strike. I have refrained from placing them in the RECORD, because if I attempted to place all of the telegrams I receive from the great Commonwealth of Pennsylvania upon public questions in the RECORD, it would be every morning many times its present size, and it is too large now. I simply desire to state that I have similar telegrams in very large number.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I have one telegram, signed by 19 employees of the Western Union at Spokane, that I desire to have read to the Senate. Other telegrams of a similar character I shall not ask to have put into the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

SPOKANE, WASH., July 6, 1918.

Hon. WESLEY JONES,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

On June 6 the employees of this office expressed to President Wilson their attitude in the present attempt by outside parties to influence them to acts of unpatriotism. We desire at this time to reaffirm that we will not be influenced by any outside persons to leave our posts of duty, but will do all in our power to render an efficient telegraphic service.

WESTERN UNION EMPLOYEES.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Was unanimous consent asked to have the telegrams read?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The request was that they be read, and they were read, without objection.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I have had a large number of telegrams, all expressing the same general thought. I simply ask to have a short one printed in the RECORD. I will state that it represents all the Western Union employees from whom I have heard. All are in the same line.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CHEYENNE, WYO., July 6, 1918.

Hon. FRANCIS E. WARREN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

The entire force of this office, consisting of 22, one hundred per cent Americans, desire to tender a vote of confidence and loyalty to the service, and assure you that there positively will not be any interruptions to the service in this important jurisdiction during this war that is in our power to prevent.

We respectfully ask your consideration of this fact in connection with legislation pending re Government operation of telegraph lines.

JAMES R. HILL,
Manager,
GILBERT F. HAYES,
Chief Operator,
Western Union Telegraph Co.

Mr. WARREN presented resolutions adopted at a meeting of sundry citizens of Wyoming, favoring the enactment of further prohibition legislation as a war measure, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I present a memorial of quite a number of citizens of Georgia, expressing opposition to the passage of Susan B. Anthony amendment to the Constitution. I only ask that it be noted, according to the rule, in the RECORD.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Jeffersonville, Twiggs County, Ga., remonstrating against the adoption of the Susan B. Anthony amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I should like to inform the Senate that I am in receipt from the city of Chicago of telegrams of similar import to those presented by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] and referred to as being similar to those received by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE]. Knowing the rule concerning the RECORD, I do not desire to embarrass the RECORD, but ask to have one of those telegrams, as characteristic of them all, printed. That one I shall choose, not exceeding two pages of telegraphic matter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, I object to printing the telegrams in the RECORD. If I had been here, I would have objected to the one last read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. LEWIS. Being a member of the Committee on Printing, I can not deny but what the objection of the Senator is wholly within the rule which the committee made, and I can not ask to be an exception to it. I, however, desire to state that I have received many telegrams the contents of which are similar to what was stated by the Senator from Pennsylvania and the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. LENROOT presented a petition of sundry citizens of Milwaukee, Wis., and a petition of sundry citizens of Oneida County, State of Wisconsin, praying for the forfeiture of citizenship of all naturalized persons found guilty of disloyalty to the Government of the United States, which were referred to the Committee on Immigration.

Mr. NELSON presented telegrams in the nature of memorials from sundry employees of the Western Union Telegraph Co., of St. Paul, Minneapolis, and Duluth, all in the State of Minnesota, remonstrating against the proposed telegraphers' strike, which were referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

GRANT OF NEW TRIALS.

Mr. WALSH, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill (S. 68) to amend section 269 of chapter 231 of the act of March 3, 1911, entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," reported it with amendments.

THE PRESIDENT'S ADDRESS TO MEXICAN EDITORS.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, I have received many requests for copies of the President's address to Mexican editors, which is not available. The address of the President to the Mexican editors, I am informed, will be of great value to the United States if circulated in the South American and Central American countries. Therefore I request that it be made a public document.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, there is but one way to have that done, and that is for the Senator to present his resolution and have it referred to the Committee on Printing. The committee will be very glad, whenever they see the importance of the Senator's suggestion, to provide that this may be done. Anything, however, may be done by unanimous consent. Representing the committee, I ask the Senator that he permit the question of printing to be referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. PHELAN. I present such a resolution, and ask that it be referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I question the propriety of that course, because this is the first time in my experience in this body that any opposition has ever been made——

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. To what?

Mr. WALSH. To the printing as a public document of a public address by the President of the United States.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I am afraid that is largely true; but that is exactly what the Committee on Printing is trying to stop.

Mr. WALSH. It does not occur to me, Mr. President, that that is quite sound. It seems to me that an exception might easily be made in respect to a public utterance of this character by the President of the United States upon a very important public question. I trust the Senator from Arizona will not insist on his objection.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. If the Senator will pardon me, I have not heard what it is proposed to print; but I know there is a proper way of having a document printed. If it be true that this document is an emanation from the President of the United States, which ought to be printed as a public document, the Committee on Printing will not hesitate one minute to see that it is done.

The Senator from Montana will sympathize with me when he knows that my purpose is to place every Member of the Senate in exactly the same attitude, so that printing may be done under the law. Otherwise, we should have no earthly way to stop excessive printing.

Mr. WALSH. I did not entertain any apprehension at all that the Committee on Printing would act unfavorably upon the printing of this document, for it seems to me the probability of favorable action is so pronounced that there would seem to be no occasion for taking that course with reference to a document of this character.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I demand the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is nothing before the Senate.

Mr. FLETCHER. The regular order is the request of the Senator from California to print as a public document an address by the President of the United States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. But to that there has been objection.

Mr. FLETCHER. I do not understand that there was objection, but that the suggestion was made that it ought to be referred to the Committee on Printing. I hope that the chairman of the Committee on Printing will not insist upon any objection, or that he will not make any objection, because this is a very important matter. I supposed the address had already been printed as a public document. I have never heard of an address of the President of the United States being denied this consideration by the Senate, and I hope the chairman of the committee will not insist upon his objection.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state it.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Is the matter before the Senate subject to debate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair does not think at present that discussion is in order.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I call for the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The regular order is the presentation of petitions and memorials.

Mr. PHELAN. I move that——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The presentation of petitions and memorials is the regular order before the Senate.

Mr. FLETCHER. Does the Senator from Arizona insist upon his objection.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I do not know what it is proposed to print, but I insist upon my objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The discussion has been ruled out of order. The presentation of petitions and memorials is in order.

Mr. FLETCHER. I submit that it is entirely proper when a request of this sort is made and objection is made, and the Senator making the objection says he does not know what the request is, that he be permitted to be informed of what the request is.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair does not think that matters of this character are in order or that requests of this kind are in order during the presentation of petitions and memorials in the morning hour. That is the ruling of the Chair. Are there further petitions or memorials?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I present a petition from the employees of the Western Union Telegraph Co., of Spokane, Wash., signed by W. E. M. Marks and 19 other employees, in which they express their desire to support the Government and the President in the present emergency, and resent the attempts, as they express it, by outside parties to influence them—that is, the employees of the Western Union Telegraph Co.—to commit acts of "unpatriotism."

In that connection, in presenting the petition, I express the hope that the Attorney General of the United States will investigate what outside parties are attempting to influence the employees of the telegraph companies to commit disloyal and unpatriotic acts.

I submit the petition for proper reference.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I have a like telegram to that presented by the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER], and unless I am permitted to have it printed in the RECORD—not the names of those signing it, but the body of the telegram—I shall read it in a speech on some future occasion, in which I shall comment upon it, thereby consuming much more time and print paper and ink than would be consumed now if the telegram were read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Illinois request that the telegram be printed in the RECORD?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is for the Senate to decide. Shall the request of the Senator from Illinois be granted? [Putting the question.] The noes have it.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I have received a telegram this morning from Mr. Leland, representing the telegraphers of Boise City, Idaho, in about the same language which has been read here. I will state that I present the matter and ask that it be referred to the committee which has charge of the subject.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so ordered.

TELEGRAPH AND TELEPHONE CONTROL.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I send a resolution to the desk which I desire to have read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the resolution.

The resolution (S. Res. 279) was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Interstate Commerce be discharged from the further consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 309) to authorize the President, in time of war, to supervise or take possession and assume control of any telegraph, telephone, marine cable, or radio system or systems or any part thereof and to operate the same in such manner as may be needful or desirable for the duration of the war and to provide just compensation therefor.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, this resolution, under the rule, will go over for a day. I hope it will be unnecessary to call it up, but I have presented it this morning in order that the Senate might be in a position at any time to proceed with its consideration if the Senate wished to do so.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, should not the resolution be referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No; not at all. The purpose of the resolution is action by the Senate.

Mr. KELLOGG. The purpose of all resolutions is action by one or both Houses of Congress.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, it seems to me rather premature and uncalled for to introduce a resolution to discharge a committee the chairman of which has announced his intention of holding hearings upon a very important question, involving, I think, as will be developed when the hearings take place, many important and complicated propositions. The Senator from Georgia, of course, is within his rights to offer the resolution, but I think he is working overtime in doing so.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I thank the Senator for his suggestion, but I will discuss that with him when the resolution is before the Senate for action, which will not be until to-morrow.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I did not hear the resolution read, but I understand it has reference to the telegraph bill which has been introduced. I may say that a bill was introduced in the Senate several days ago and was referred, I believe, to the Committee on Military Affairs, and then, on motion of the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], that committee was discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and it was referred to the Interstate Commerce Committee. A similar bill passed the other House, came to the Senate, and on Saturday, I believe, it was referred to the Interstate Commerce Committee. The Interstate Commerce Committee had a brief session on Saturday evening, when it decided to go forward with the hearings, and a meeting of that committee has been called for 2 o'clock this afternoon. I simply wish the Senate to know the present status of the bill.

FUNERAL EXPENSES OF THE LATE SENATOR TILLMAN.

Mr. THOMPSON, Mr. LEWIS, and Mr. VARDAMAN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas has been seeking recognition for some time, and is recognized.

Mr. THOMPSON. I desire to call up Senate resolution 278, reported by me on Saturday last, authorizing the payment of the funeral expenses of the late Senator TILLMAN, which on objection by the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] went to the calendar. I should like to have the resolution passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator can not do that on Monday under the new rule, which was adopted on the 2d of July.

Mr. THOMPSON. Can it not be done by unanimous consent? There is no question as to the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will submit the question to the Senate. The Senator from Kansas asks unanimous consent for the consideration of the resolution to which he has referred. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, for the information of the Senate, may the new rule be read?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the new rule.

The Secretary read the rule adopted on July 2, 1918, as follows:

Provided, however, That on Mondays the calendar shall be called under Rule VIII, and during the morning hour no motion shall be entertained to proceed to the consideration of any bill, resolution, report of a committee, or other subject upon the calendar except the motion to continue the consideration of a bill, resolution, report of a committee, or other subject against objection as provided in Rule VIII.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has no right under that rule to entertain the motion.

Mr. THOMPSON. I think by unanimous consent the Chair can do so. We can do most anything by unanimous consent. We can suspend any rule without notice under the express provision of Rule XL, except as otherwise provided in clause 1, Rule XII, which refers to voting. This is the only exception in the rules.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has no right under that rule to entertain the motion. If the Senator can get the rule suspended, the Chair can entertain it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, allow me to suggest to the Chair that by unanimous consent the Chair could entertain the motion. A rule can be suspended by a two-thirds vote, and by unanimous consent, if everybody agrees, the rule, of course, can be suspended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will be very glad to submit the question to the Senate.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I simply wished to make the suggestion to the Chair, because it seems to me that by unanimous consent we can do anything.

Mr. FLETCHER. May I inquire if the Chair has announced that morning business is over?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate is still under the order of concurrent and other resolutions in the morning hour.

Mr. FLETCHER. Then there is an order of business for the consideration of resolutions coming over from a previous day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution referred to by the Senator from Kansas has been reported and is on the calendar.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. President, it does seem to me that by unanimous consent we can suspend the rule. It would be extremely technical and might prove very dangerous to hold otherwise in construing the new rule, for to do so would require the calling of the entire calendar when a very important matter requiring immediate consideration might be necessary to be considered, which certainly ought to be permitted by unanimous consent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will leave the matter to the Senate. The Senator from Kansas asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution to which he refers. Is there objection?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I should like to have the resolution stated, so that we may know what it is.

Mr. THOMPSON. It is merely the usual and ordinary resolution to pay the funeral expenses of the late Senator TILLMAN. This is the third time I have attempted to bring it up. The expense has already been incurred, but under the law not a single dollar can be paid until authorized by this resolution, and many are waiting for their money.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. We merely wished to know what the resolution was.

Mr. THOMPSON. It is the third time I have endeavored to bring up the resolution for consideration, and I shall not do so again. There should never have been any objection to a resolution of this character, and, so far as I know, it is the first time in the history of the Senate when the consideration of such a resolution has been objected to or even delayed by any Senator.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There being no objection, the resolution was read, considered, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secetary of the Senate be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to pay from the miscellaneous items of the contingent fund of the Senate the actual and necessary expenses incurred by the committee appointed by the Vice President in arranging for and attending the funeral of the Hon. BENJAMIN R. TILLMAN, late a Senator from the State of South Carolina, upon vouchers to be approved by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

THE PRESIDENT'S ADDRESS TO MEXICAN EDITORS.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, what is the regular order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. We are still under the order of morning business. The regular order is the presentation of concurrent and other resolutions.

Mr. PHELAN. I submit the resolution which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 281), as follows:

Resolved, That the address made by the President of the United States to the Mexican editors at the White House on June 7, 1918, be printed as a public document.

Mr. PHELAN. I ask that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Printing.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made. Are there further concurrent or other resolutions?

TELEGRAPH AND TELEPHONE CONTROL.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I rose a few moments ago, when the very appropriate resolution concerning the payment of the funeral expenses of the late Senator TILLMAN was presented, to add a word, and just a word and no more, to the observations made by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] concerning the resolution of the Interstate Commerce Committee as to entering upon hearings upon the joint resolution to take over the telegraph lines. What I desired to say was concerning the resolution of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH]. The Senator from Ohio has made it clear that the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce has passed a resolution to enter at once upon hearings and the consideration of the measure. I desire merely to add that that resolution had been passed and had been disposed of before the resolution was presented to the Senate touching the question of a recess. That has not been generally understood; and to those to whom the subject is interesting at all, I desire to give that information.

Mr. POMERENE. In view of the suggestion made by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS], I have before me now a copy of the resolution which was adopted by the Interstate Commerce Committee respecting these hearings, and, if there is no objection, I ask that it be incorporated in the RECORD.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I ask that the resolution be read.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Let it be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reading is called for, and, without objection, the Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

It is moved that it is the sense of the Interstate Commerce Committee of the Senate that it proceed without delay to enter upon a hearing upon House resolution 309, and that the chairman of the committee be requested to make the necessary arrangement for the attendance of interested parties, and that a report upon the resolution be made as soon as possible.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Did the Senator from Ohio suggest that that motion had been adopted by the committee?

Mr. POMERENE. It was adopted by the committee.

Mr. LEWIS. On Saturday?

Mr. POMERENE. It was adopted on Saturday evening.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I wish to ask the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH], who offered a resolution to discharge the Committee on Interstate Commerce from the further consideration of this measure, whether that had the concurrence of the Committee on Interstate Commerce and the Committee on Military Affairs?

I understood the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] the other day, when he successfully moved to discharge the Committee on Military Affairs from the further consideration of this matter and had it referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce, to state to the Senate that that motion had the consent of both those committees. I wonder what the situation is now.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I could not hear the Senator, owing to the noise in the Chamber being so great.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senators will suspend and the Chair will try to obtain order.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I understood the Senator from Iowa the other day to state that the motion to discharge the Committee on Military Affairs from the further consideration of the House joint resolution providing for the taking over of the telegraph and telephone lines by the Government had the concurrence of both the Military Affairs Committee and the Committee on Interstate Commerce. I wondered if the Senator from Georgia could give me any information in regard to that.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I have no information upon that subject, but I will state to the Senator my reasons for introducing the resolution. There was a good deal of talk on Saturday about taking a month's recess while the Interstate Commerce Committee was considering this joint resolution, and the proposition was made to adjourn the Senate for 30 days. I voted against that proposition. I do not believe any such hearing is necessary. I would be very much opposed to delaying the consideration of this question by the Senate for any such time. I do not regard it as a complicated question; I do not regard the joint resolution passed by the House as one about which we need much information that we do not already possess, and I really think that it is a subject that could come to the Senate very shortly for discussion. I introduced this resolution to-day because, under the rules, such a resolution can not be considered until the next day after its introduction, in order that it might be before the Senate, so that at a later day, if I saw fit, without 24 hours' delay, I might call it up. Whether I shall call it up to-morrow I do not know, but I only took the precaution of having it upon the Secretary's desk so that, if it was deemed desirable to bring it up, a delay of 24 hours would not be necessary.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I understand the Senator's motive in introducing it. What I asked him was whether he had consulted with the Committee on Military Affairs and the Committee on Interstate Commerce, and whether the motion met their views?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I was acting simply as a Member of the Senate who believed that this joint resolution might properly come before the Senate for discussion during the present week, and might properly be disposed of in the Senate during the present week, and because I differed from those who, in casual conversation, had expressed the opinion—not speaking for the committee at all, but speaking individually—that the joint resolution should receive before the committee a month's consideration. I do not feel that so lengthy a hearing is necessary. I think it can be properly disposed of at a much earlier time, and I wish to add that the presentation of this resolution was not intended in any way as a reflection upon the Military Affairs Committee or the Interstate Commerce Committee, but as an expression of my dissent from what I had heard, not from members of that committee, but from other Senators upon the subject of delay.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I should like to ask the Senator another question in that connection. Of course, his resolution is to discharge the committee from the further consideration of this matter. The Senate has sent the joint resolution to the Committee on Interstate Commerce. Does the Senator think the joint resolution ought to have consideration by any committee?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I think the joint resolution can very shortly, if not immediately, be considered by the Senate. I think there is very little to be found out by investigation that is not now known; and, so far as I am personally concerned, I am ready for its consideration upon the floor of the Senate.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, does the Senator really think that a momentous question of that kind should be taken up on the floor of the Senate without consideration by any committee of the Senate?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Ordinarily I would say no; I would think it should be considered; but I do not believe that there is connected with this matter anything that will be elucidated by the investigation that Senators do not now know. I think the controlling problem with reference to this action involves matters that will not be developed by hearings before the committee.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I am not familiar with the joint resolution that was sent to the Interstate Commerce Committee.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I did not intend to bring it up to-day, and I do not know that I shall call it up to-morrow. As I stated, my object in presenting it to-day was that if, later on, I desired to call it up I would not be delayed 24 hours in doing so.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. My purpose in asking the Senator from Georgia the questions which I have asked him was to ascertain from him if his motion should prevail and the committee should be discharged from the consideration of the matter, whether it was his purpose to bring up the matter on the floor of the Senate without any evidence or testimony or consideration of the matter except what Senators could furnish on the floor.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If I do call up the resolution later, and it should be adopted by the Senate, it would be with the view of immediate consideration of the subject by the Senate.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question? He has evidently devoted profound study to this subject, because he is ready to vote on it right away.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Senator is right about that. I congratulate him upon the soundness of his conclusion.

Mr. PENROSE. For myself, I must confess my ignorance, and I want to be shown; but I should like to ask the Senator a question. As the result of his studies, does he believe that a telephone itself should be installed in every post office in the country, and in this measure does he include the 20,000 independent telephone lines, many of them on the verge of bankruptcy, in the proposition of Government ownership?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It is not a proposition of Government ownership.

Mr. PENROSE. Well, of Government control.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Government supervision or Government control.

Mr. PENROSE. Yes. Does he include the 20,000 independent telephone lines, which are largely on the same basis as the short-line railroads?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. My own view is that the important control is the long-distance control—the telegraph control especially, and the control of the long-distance telephone lines. I think that a wise action might except from actual Government operation the short-distance lines; but I do believe it most important, in connection with the present military condition of the country, that the telegraph lines and the long-distance telephone lines should be under Government supervision.

Mr. PENROSE. Then the Senator, notwithstanding his prolonged study, which permits him to vote upon this thing to-day, is uncertain as to the extent to which Government control should be extended to the short-distance independent lines on the verge of bankruptcy?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. And I do not think that will be settled by the investigation of the committee. I do not think it probable that it can be.

Mr. PENROSE. A number of letters are already coming to Senators from persons interested in these semibankrupt telephone lines urging the passage of this joint resolution, and I can see opportunities of a very enlarged character for the gentlemen interested in these concerns. The Senator's views, however, seem to me a little nebulous on this point.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It is the Senator's mind which is nebulous that does not grasp them.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Georgia yield to me for a question?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. NELSON. My question is, Is this measure for taking over the control of the telegraph lines and the telephone lines based upon this alleged threatened "strike," or is it based upon the ground of military necessity?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Military necessity.

Mr. NELSON. I want to say to the Senator that if it is based upon the ground of a threatened strike, evidence has appeared here in the numerous telegrams that this strike is a manufactured strike, outside of the regular employees. Is the Senator convinced of that?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am very much gratified that we have the information that came to us this morning upon that subject, and I hope it is true; and, so far as I can see, I believe it is true.

Mr. NELSON. I am glad to hear that.

Mr. LEWIS obtained the floor.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I call for the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The regular order is the introduction of concurrent and other resolutions. The Senator from Illinois was recognized under that head.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I did not rise to present a resolution, but to respond to the query of the Senator from Connecticut for some information upon this subject, and if that is out of order I will not press it now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The regular order has been called for. Are there further concurrent or other resolutions?

AMENDMENT OF THE RULES.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I offer the resolution which I send to the desk and ask that it may be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 280), as follows:

Resolved, That Rule XXII of the standing rules of the Senate be, and hereby is, amended as follows:

After the word "debate," where it first occurs in said rule, strike out the period and insert a colon and the following:

"Provided, however, That any motion or resolution proposing an adjournment or recess of either or both Houses of Congress for a greater interval of time than three days shall be debatable.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I have offered this resolution because I think it was demonstrated here on Saturday night that there is an absolute necessity for it. Upon the question of adjournment for a period longer than three days certainly there should be more nearly a unanimous sentiment than was expressed by the vote on Saturday night. I believe that if we had had an opportunity to debate the question and to get information regarding the situation surrounding the business of the Senate, the Senate would have reached a conclusion more nearly unanimous than it reached at that time. I have no objection to limiting the debate upon such a motion or resolution, and I suggest that the Committee on Rules consider the advisability of limiting the debate, but I certainly feel that there should be debate upon such a question.

I have learned since Saturday night, and learned after the adjournment on Saturday night, that important conferences had been held bearing directly upon the question as to whether or not the Senate should adjourn for a greater period than three days, but I did not have that information until after the Senate had passed the concurrent resolution. The Senator who moved that we concur in the concurrent resolution objected to debate. There was no opportunity to debate it or to gain any information regarding it, and upon such an important matter there should be an opportunity to get some information and to have some kind of debate. I hope the Committee on Rules will consider the advisability of limiting the debate. I think it should be done, although I have not provided for it in the resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be referred to the Committee on Rules.

PENSIONS AND INCREASE OF PENSIONS—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. WALSH submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 12229) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 2, 10, 15, 19, 21, 27, and 30.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 3, 4, 7, 8, 9, 12, 13, 14, 16, 17, 18, 20, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 28, 29, 31, 32, 33, 34, 36, 37, and 38, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 5, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$32"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 6, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$36"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 11, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Restore the matter stricken out, amended to read as follows:

"The name of Emma L. Randall, widow of George W. Randall, late of Company B, One hundred and ninety-fourth Regiment New York Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $12 per month."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 35, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$36"; and the Senate agree to the same.

T. J. WALSH,
WILLIAM H. THOMPSON,
REED SMOOT,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

WILLIAM A. ASHBROOK,
JOUETT SHOUSE,
JOHN W. LANGLEY,
Managers on the part of the House.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, what is the first item in the bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state it.

The SECRETARY. The first item in the bill is the name of William Wilson.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Very well.

Mr. WALSH. I ask that the Senate agree to the conference report.

The report was agreed to.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles and referred to the Committee on Commerce:

H. R. 8839. An act for the establishment of Oswego, in the State of New York, as a port of entry for immediate transportation without appraisement of dutiable merchandise; and

H. R. 12002. An act for the establishment of Bar Harbor, in the State of Maine, as a port of entry and delivery for the immediate transportation without appraisement of dutiable merchandise.

NOBEL PEACE PRIZE.

H. J. Res. 313. Joint resolution providing for the disposition of moneys represented in the Alfred Bernard Nobel peace prize, awarded in 1906, was read twice by its title.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, may the joint resolution be read for the information of the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the joint resolution.

The joint resolution (H. J. Res. 313) was read, as follows:

Whereas in compliance with the expressed desire of Theodore Roosevelt Congress passed an act entitled "An act to establish the Foundation for the Promotion of Industrial Peace," approved March 2, 1907, in which act trustees were created and appointed with power to accept from the said Theodore Roosevelt the money gift carried as a part of the Nobel peace prize awarded him in the year 1906; and

Whereas the trustees, or industrial peace committee, created under said act still has in its custody the moneys represented in the said Nobel prize, and accretions thereto, and has not found it practicable to dispose of the same in accordance with the provisions of said act: Therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That the industrial peace committee, created under an act of Congress entitled "An act to establish the Foundation for the Promotion of Industrial Peace," approved March 2, 1907, be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to return to the Hon. Theodore Roosevelt the sum of money in its hands, principal and interest, represented in the Nobel peace prize, and placed with it in accord with the expressed desires and purposes of Theodore Roosevelt in 1907.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate as in Committee of the Whole proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President, if I may be permitted just one word of explanation, this matter was in the hands of the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] on Saturday last. He had a letter from Hon. Theodore Roosevelt in respect to it. The Senator from Mississippi was called away suddenly by a death in his family, and then, by Congressman GALLIVAN, he sent me the letter that had been written to him by Mr. Roosevelt and asked that I present the matter in his stead. That letter I have, and I will ask, please, that the Secretary may read it. It explains the situation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Secretary will read the letter.

The SECRETARY read as follows:

[The Kansas City Star. Office of Theodore Roosevelt. New York Office, 347 Madison Avenue.]

JULY 2, 1918.

MY DEAR SENATOR WILLIAMS: After the Peace of Portsmouth I was awarded the Nobel prize medal. This carried with it the gift to me of the sum of about $40,000. The gift was to me outright, but I did not care to use it for myself under the circumstances, so I gave it as a foundation for an industrial peace fund. Congress created a commission to receive and use it. It seems, however, that it did not prove practicable to make the use intended of the money. Nothing whatever has been done with it and it still is in the hands of the commissioners. We are now in a great crisis and the utmost demand is being made upon the charity of every man and woman, rich or poor. Under these circumstances I do not think it right that this money should lie idle; and I do think it most appropriate that the Nobel peace prize fund should be used through appropriate organizations to care for our soldiers, and for the widows and children and mothers of our soldiers in this great war, waged to secure the only kind of peace worth having—the peace which is founded on right and justice and mercy.

Accordingly I am writing to you and to Congressman GALLIVAN to ask if you will not put this communication immediately before the two Houses of Congress. I desire Congress to give me back, or rather authorize and direct the commissioners created under the prior law of Congress to give me back, the Nobel peace prize fund. I shall then at once apply it for purposes above indicated, through the Red Cross, the Young Men's Christian Association (both white and colored branches), the Knights of Columbus, the Jewish war fund, and any similar organizations which I may think at the moment would do peculiarly good work. At the end of the year I will report to you and to Congressman GALLIVAN the exact disposition made of the fund, sending you, if you so desire, the full correspondence, the stubs of the checks, etc.

I feel that, as the money was given to me to be used as I desired, the proper course to take is the one I have requested. But I feel much more strongly that in any event the money should no longer remain as a "talent wrapped in a napkin and buried in the ground," but should be used to help meet the needs created by this terrible war. Accordingly if there is objection to having me receive and dispose of it as above outlined, I ask that the money be turned over to a committee composed of yourself and Congressman GALLIVAN and the Speaker of the House, who will report by the end of the year to Congress the disposal of the funds they have made; or, if you feel that such extra work should be undertaken by those not pressed by public business, I suggest that you turn the money over to a committee of three, consisting of Mrs. Thomas J. Preston, widow of the late President Cleveland; Maurice Egan, late minister to Denmark; and Nathaniel Elsberg, former State senator of New York. They could report in similar fashion.

The essential thing is that immediate action be taken. Senator LODGE and Congressman LONGWORTH know about the fund, and Mr. Oscar Straus is one of the gentlemen now interested with its administration. I think the Chief Justice is another. I do not see that there can be any objection on grounds of policy to using this idle money immediately for this most worthy of purposes. If there is objection to the money being distributed as above outlined by me, the donor, then I request that either of the committees I have suggested, or some similar committee which may commend itself to your judgment, be appointed to distribute the fund. In any event, I trust there will be immediate action.

Faithfully, yours, THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

Hon. JOHN SHARP WILLIAMS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I have long contemplated bringing to the attention of the Senate a very small matter, but one which in honor should have been brought to the attention of the public some time ago. I avail myself of this second, and but for a second, I trust, to impose on the indulgence of the Senate, to bring before the Senate now the matter that should have been made clear by me earlier.

Mr. President, I have listened to this letter. From the letter we all glean the object that the ex-President has. In connection with this matter I have seen it reported in certain press dispatches and as coming from certain gentlemen that consideration should not be extended to the ex-President as he has desired, and among other things it is charged that a Col. Lewis was guilty of insubordination in office in connection with the report made, known as the "embalmed-beef" report, and that Col. Roosevelt issued a round robin in support of this report, and in a manner which violated all the military rules, and it is alleged that this Col. Lewis, as well as Col. Roosevelt, should have been subjected to court-martial; also that Col. Lewis instead of being awarded large sums for an invented gun passed to the Government he should have been submitted to the country for proper punishment for an infraction of military law.

Mr. President, I do not know in detail the controversy between Col. Lewis of the gun and our Government, but that Col. Lewis must not be permitted to bear any odium that attaches to that report frequently now referred to as embalmed-beef report, nor should Theodore Roosevelt be charged with the responsibility. It happens the present Senator from Illinois, JAMES HAMILTON LEWIS, myself, was the Lewis then in the service as inspector general, serving on the staff of Gen. Fred Dent Grant, who now let it be confessed, in an ardor not measured by military discipline, and an impulse perchance not controlled by official dignity, made the report known as the embalmed beef. I stopped the ship Ohio from embarking, and after passage of certain telegraphic correspondence I indulged in animadversions against officers of the military administration then in power functioning here at Washington. I was discharging my office on way from Cuba to Porto Rico. It was at Newport News, Va., where the first report adverse to the meat was made by me.

The court-martial that followed the events were addressed to Col. Davis and Gen. Miles, and involved me, as it should. The action of Col. Roosevelt was one that an officer merely took upon the report of facts from another source, to which he gave credence, and which naturally he would have relied upon until the contrary had been proven. Later, upon investigation, he issued his round robin, so called, as a protest against feeding the soldiers the poisonous stuff.

I have had no opportunity officially in this honorable body among my colleagues to meet the matter with propriety as a Senator. Now, since this request within the last few days on the part of Col. Roosevelt has been made, and there have been circulated throughout the country and again been revived all these charges, this much in honor to myself and in justice to all involved I must take the first opportunity to state, as I now have.

The violations of military law at that time were my own, and the infractions of the military code were my own. The impulse or the ardor or the impetuosity which resulted in the lack of respect for superior officers was my own. The Col. Lewis of the gun, I fancy, had no more knowledge of the matter than the honorable chairman of the Senate.

As far as Col. Roosevelt is concerned and Col. Guild, serving at Jacksonville, now dead, a distinguished officer then and a distinguished statesman since, they took their information from a fellow officer and reported upon the facts as they had them.

Now, in closing my observations, I say if what these opponents of the action call "ignominy" must rest upon any man for violating the military laws it must be upon my head the judgment should be visited for doing the undignified thing; the man who ought to bear it under the sacred law of "Give unto Cæsar that which is Cæsar's and unto God that which is God's," is JAMES HAMILTON LEWIS, not Col. Lewis, the inventor.

Whatever may be the faults of Col. Roosevelt, whatever may be the things I oppose in him, whatever may be the political things with which he encountered my opposition, he will no longer be held up before the country, nor Col. Lewis, the inventor of the gun, as being responsible for these violations, if they were of that kind to bring on anyone punishment, criticism, or condemnation, if I can by this correction avoid the unjust censure.

In justice to the situation, in justice to all, I am the individual whose violations should bear the whole brunt and responsibility; and at this moment I make this explanation that hereafter through the country it will be known that the Col. Lewis of the Spanish-American War who violated the law, if such was done, and violated the military regulations, if such was done, and who was the object of court-martial consideration, was myself. That the attitude or the conduct of Col. Roosevelt and his course at that time were based upon reports of a fellow officer which he took for granted as true, and that the subsequent investigation of court-martial, had it been permitted in full at all, would have confirmed the justice of Col. Roosevelt in what he did. At this moment I merely explain the facts.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

Mr. LEWIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Is that the reason why the administration refused to supply the Army with the Lewis gun and we have few machine guns except those we buy from the French?

Mr. LEWIS. There may be foundations for the fact that there was a Lewis who was held in certain odium by certain officials in such a way that nothing that carried his name would have been approved even if it had been otherwise acceptable. I was responsible not for the gun or for anything of mechanical perfection. There are certain officials who would give nothing that carried my name their approval, but I do not think any condemnation of his invention was chargeable to me.

I have completed my observations to set the record right for the future, and I should like to at once pass the resolution, and not only pass the resolution but to allow Col. Roosevelt to discharge the expenditure of this fund and administer it in such sense or order as he as a gentleman and patriot would direct, and I would that we shall not make the reflection upon his integrity or sense of justice by committing the expenditure of the fund to any other keeping—of committee or person.

Mr. PHELAN. May I ask the Senator before he takes his seat if I understood him that he was one of the signatories to the round robin?

Mr. LEWIS. I had made the report condemning the beef before the round robin was issued. The round robin was the thing that followed my action. I acted as inspector general, ranking as colonel serving on staff duty, first having been assigned to Gen. Brooke at Habana, then later to Gen. Grant in Porto Rico.

The Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD] has asked me what was the result of the court-martial. In justice, in the first place, my expressions in my communications to the War Department were condemned without qualification. I was charged with having uttered language unbecoming an officer to a superior. The Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] asks if it was true. I regret to say it was true. It was, as I remarked a moment ago, expressions in the fervor of ardor and zeal of an officer at the time with more emotion than dignity.

As to the beef, Mr. President, the attitude of Col. Roosevelt and those in condemning the material on round robin was approved, but Lewis's language and unmilitary reflections on superior officers were not approved.

Mr. PHELAN. May I ask the Senator if the statute of limitations has expired so that the Senator has immunity?

Mr. LEWIS. This particular Senator seeks no protection. It is only fair to say that the lapse of time has gone by sufficiently for people who condemned him then to act more generously to him later.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, the Senator from Illinois having united himself with Cæsar and God, I suppose he has achieved his object. I am heartily in favor of the joint resolution called up by the Senator from California.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President, now that the anxiety of a waiting and expectant people has been relieved, I trust we may proceed with the joint resolution.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I rose to do a thing that I felt I owed. I did not expect to invite the delicate satire of my eminent friend from Connecticut, who, in order to gratify himself in his ambition to emulate the wasp, gave evidence that he is still alive to subject matters of legislation in the Senate by an uncalled-for explosion from his vitriol vial, nor did I expect the honorable Senator from California to give evidence of a sarcasm offensive in its tone as it was empty in its meaning. I sought in no wise in my observations to embarrass anything, nor to address myself to the public, nor to obtain any advantage from any source. I merely sought to do that which I owed under the circumstances, and I deeply regret the standards of gentility of speech adopted by other gentlemen in other places are ignored by the Senator from California to employ in their place observations as offensive to me as they are unbecoming to decency.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President, I appreciate, of course, perfectly the retort of the Senator from Illinois. If I had understood what the Senator from Illinois stated, or if it had been at all comprehensible, I probably would have felt infinitely more rebuked; and if by any process of reasoning I could have understood the pertinency of his remarks to the joint resolution, I would stand here wholly abashed. But whether the remarks of the Senator from Illinois were comprehensible or pertinent or related wholly to himself, I had no remarks to make upon this particular joint resolution and have no personal interest in it of any sort, and I do not object in the slightest degree to his self-advertisement if he favors it. Certainly, for myself, I only ask for the passage of the joint resolution.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, in reply to what my colleague has said I wish to read a telegram, dated July 6, 1918, Chicago, Ill., addressed to myself, as follows:

We believe the Government control of telegraph and telephone lines at this time unwise and unwarranted. The company's officers and employees are experienced in their profession and are loyal citizens, and in our opinion are as equally able to assist the Government under their present organizations as would be the case if these companies were turned over to Government officials already overburdened with other duties. We, the employees of the Western Union Telegraph Co., have no intention of allowing any labor organization interfering with our work, and place our support to our country and the telegraph company.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, in connection with this same matter, I should like the Secretary to read a very brief report which appears in the Washington Times of this noon as to the telegraph strike being called off.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection, and the Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

CHICAGO, July 8.

Recalled at the eleventh hour, the Commercial Telegraphers' Union strike order to Western Union employees was not effective to-day.

President S. J. Konenkamp, in compliance with requests by Secretary of Labor Wilson and Samuel Gompers, formally withdrew the strike order late yesterday.

Konenkamp declared to-day that there will be no strike until the Government has further opportunity to act.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

THE CALENDAR.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there is no further morning business, the morning business is closed, and the calendar, under Rule VIII, is in order.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask unanimous consent that we proceed with the calendar, under Rule VIII, beginning with Order of Business 444. I will state to the Senate that is the place where we left off when the calendar was last under consideration, and I ask that we proceed with the consideration of bills on the calendar to which there is no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Utah asks that the calendar be proceeded with, at the number mentioned, under Rule VIII.

Mr. POMERENE. At what number?

Mr. SMOOT. No. 444, the bill that we reached the last time the calendar was under consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there is no objection, the Secretary will begin with the number mentioned. The Chair hears none.

The bill (S. 4548) to protect the lives and health and morals of women and minor workers in the District of Columbia, and to establish a minimum wage board, and define its powers and duties, and to provide for the fixing of minimum wages for such workers, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. As that bill may lead to some discussion and there are very few Senators here I ask that it may go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will go over.

DISTRICT FIRE DEPARTMENT.

The bill (H. R. 11231) to regulate the hours of duty of the officers and members of the fire department of the District of Columbia was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia with amendments.

The first amendment was, after the enacting clause to strike out all down to and including line 9 and insert:

That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia shall, when in their judgment a sufficient number of officers and men have been obtained for the maintenance and operation of the fire department of the District of Columbia, and such action can be taken without interference with the efficiency of said department, so regulate the hours of duty of the said officers and men as to provide for a day and night force, respectively, the said forces to alternate on tours of duty once or more every two weeks.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 3, page 2, line 11, after the word "are," to strike out "directed" and insert "authorized," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 3. That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia are authorized to appoint a sufficient number of men and officers in addition to the existing force to carry out the objects of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 5, page 2, line 22, after the word "acts," to strike out "and shall not annul, modify, or affect any city ordinance, or part or parts thereof."

Mr. KING. Mr. President, this seems to be a very important measure. Apparently it is intended to supplement existing legislation. I should like to ask if there is any member of the committee here who will explain the provisions of the bill. I think I shall ask that it go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made, and the bill goes over.

Mr. JONES of Washington subsequently said: Mr. President, I came in just a moment ago, when I think Order of Business 445, being House bill 11231, was before the Senate, but I did not know that that was the bill under consideration. The Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] asked that it go over because there were no members of the Committee on the District of Columbia, from which the bill had been reported, present. I hope the Senator will not insist upon his objection. The measure has passed the other House and I think we also provided in the District of Columbia appropriation bill for the appropriation which is involved.

The purpose of this proposed act is to authorize the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to establish the platoon system as a permanent system, as it has been found to work most splendidly in different cities of the country. I know in the city of Seattle, in my State, it has worked nicely. I hope the Senator from Utah will withdraw his objection to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I have no objection to the measure. I did not know the extent to which it went, but I knew that it was an important bill, and no member of the committee being present to give us any information regarding it, I asked that it go over. I now withdraw my objection, in view of the statement which has been made by the Senator from Washington.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I thank the Senator from Utah.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Senate will return to the consideration of the bill, which has been partially considered.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 11231) to regulate the hours of duty of the officers and members of the fire department of the District of Columbia.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, section 5, line 22, the Committee on the District of Columbia reported an amendment to strike out the words "and shall not annul, modify, or affect any city ordinance, or part or parts thereof," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 5. That, except as herein provided, the provisions of this act shall not act as a repeal of any act or acts, or part or parts of any act or acts, relating to the salaries, annual leave or vacation, sick or disability leave of absence of the officers and members of the fire-fighting force of the District of Columbia.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

CORPORATIONS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The bill (S. 4000) to authorize corporations organized in the District of Columbia to change their names, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia with amendments to insert after the enacting clause the following:

That the Code of Law for the District of Columbia be, and the same is hereby, amended by inserting another section, to be known as section 639a, which shall read as follows:

On page 1, line 7, before the word "That" to insert "Sec. 639a"; on page 2, before the word "That," to strike out "Sec. 2"; on page 3, line 6, before the word "That," to strike out "Sec. 3"; and on page 4, line 13, before the word "That," to strike out "Sec. 4," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Code of Law for the District of Columbia be, and the same is hereby, amended by inserting another section, to be known as section 639a, which shall read as follows:

SEC. 639a. That any corporation organized under the laws of the District of Columbia may change its name in the manner following:

"The board of directors shall pass a resolution declaring that such change is advisable and calling a meeting of the stockholders to take action thereon. Such meeting shall be called upon such notice as the by-laws provide, and in the absence of such provision upon 10 days' notice given personally to each stockholder as his address is contained in the records of such corporation, a notice deposited in the United States mail, postage prepaid, at least 10 days prior to such meeting to be considered sufficient notice under this act If two-thirds in interest of each class of stockholders having voting powers and of other persons having like powers shall vote in favor of such a change, a certificate thereof shall be signed by the president and secretary, under the corporate seal, and acknowledged as in the case of deeds of real estate, and such certificate shall be filed in the office of the recorder of deeds of the District of Columbia, and upon the filing of the same the certificate of incorporation shall be deemed to be amended and the name changed accordingly; and the filing of said certificate in conformity with this act shall have the same force and effect as to all future proceedings as if said certificate of incorporation or organization had been originally drafted in conformity with the amendment so made.

"That a certified copy of any such certificate shall be taken and accepted as evidence in all courts and places of all matters legally stated therein; and the recorder of deeds shall keep an index in his office showing the new name and the change from the old name, and the old name showing the change to the new name; and no fees shall be required by the recorder of deeds for filing and recording any such certificate, except that ordinarily required for deeds of real estate of like length.

"That a corporation under its new name shall have the same rights, powers, and privileges, and shall be subject to the same duties, obligations, and liabilities as before, and may sue and be sued by its new name, but no action brought against it or by it under its former name shall be abated on that account, and on motion of either party the new name may be substituted therefor in the action.

"That upon the filing of said certificate for record a copy thereof shall be inserted, by the corporation whose name has been changed as hereinabove provided, once each week for four consecutive weeks, in two daily papers published in the District of Columbia."

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. KING. The bill was reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It was reported by the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. KING. I regret very much that the bill was not sent to the Judiciary Committee. I have certain information which the Judiciary Committee now possesses, which will lead to several emendations of the present act of incorporation. One will permit the holding of meetings of corporations under the laws of the District outside of the District and another will permit the selection of more directors who are nonresidents of the District than are now permitted under the present law. Informally some of those questions have been discussed by members of the Judiciary Committee, and there is an apparent inclination upon the part of those to whom I refer to report a bill amending the present statute.

This amendment would be in harmony with the amendments to which I have just referred that it is contemplated shall be made to the present act of incorporation. I think this measure is necessary, but I regret that it is not before the Judiciary Committee so that one bill might have taken care of the entire matter. I shall make no objection, however, to the consideration of this bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CONTROL OF STREET PARKING IN THE DISTRICT.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 3835) to amend an act entitled "An act to vest in the Commissioners of the District of Columbia control of street parking in said District." It proposes to amend paragraph (b) of section 2 of the act of Congress approved July 1, 1898, entitled "An act to vest in the Commissioners of the District of Columbia control of street parking in said District," so as to read as follows:

(b) All portions of the space in the streets and avenues of the said District, after the same shall have been set aside by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia for park purposes, and all spaces forming parcels, squares, or blocks which have been or may be dedicated to or otherwise acquired by the District of Columbia for park purposes, and which may be transferred to the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, for said purposes.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS PASSED OVER.

The bill (H. R. 10891) to amend and reenact an act for the establishment of a probation system for the District of Columbia was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Let that bill go over, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KING in the chair). The bill goes over.

The bill (S. 3379) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to exchange public coal lands for private coal lands in certain cases was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Let that bill go over, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill goes over.

The bill (S. 4439) to provide for the survey of a national highway connecting certain national monuments in the States of Utah, Arizona, and New Mexico was announced as next in order.

Mr. LENROOT. Let that bill go over, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

MINAM NATIONAL FOREST, OREG.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 3864) to add certain lands to the Minam National Forest, Oreg. It proposes to include and make a part of the Minam National Forest, subject to all prior valid adverse rights, the lands to be hereafter subject to all laws affecting national forests: Sections 34 and 35, the north half of section 36, township 7 south, range 43 east, and sections 2 and 3, township 8 south, range 43 east, all of Willamette meridian, in Oregon.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LIZZIE G. GARIN.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 4524) to validate the homestead entry of Lizzie G. Garin. It proposes that the homestead entry numbered 011395, made by Lizzie G. Garin for the west half of southeast quarter, section 3, west half of northeast quarter, section 10, township 35 north, range 3 east, Montana principal meridian, be validated, and the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to issue patent thereon upon the submission of satisfactory proof of compliance with the laws under which the entry was allowed.

Mr. SMOOT. I desire to ask the Senator reporting the bill if this particular legislation was added to the general relief bill, being Senate bill 3797, which passed the Senate May 17, 1918?

Mr. MYERS. No; it was not. This particular bill was sent to the committee by the Secretary of the Interior, and its passage was requested after the passage of the bill referred to by the Senator from Utah. This proposed legislation is not included in that bill.

Mr. SMOOT. The Commissioner of the General Land Office asked the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands of the other House to add it to that bill; and what I wanted to know was whether or not the request of the commissioner had been complied with in the other House?

Mr. MYERS. I do not know whether or not it was complied with in the House; I can not say.

Mr. SMOOT. If it was, it would be unnecessary to pass this measure.

Mr. MYERS. If it was added to the other bill, it would be held up in the House and indefinitely postponed. So the passage of the bill here will do no harm.

Mr. SMOOT. So long as the Senator from Montana is not positively informed as to the matter, I will not object to the passage of this bill.

Mr. MYERS. No; I do not know.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ANTON HIERSCHE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2323) authorizing Anton Hiersche to select other land in lieu of land now owned by him, required for reclamation purposes. The bill was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That Anton Hiersche, who is the record owner of the northeast quarter of section 16, township 23 north, range 54 west, sixth principal meridian, in Nebraska, which lies partly within the area required for Reservoir No. 2, in the North Platte irrigation project, constructed under the reclamation act of June 17, 1902 (32 Stats., p. 388), and acts amendatory thereof and supplementary thereto, is hereby authorized in lieu of so much thereof as may be flooded by said reservoir to a contour line 6 feet above the sill of the outlet gates therefor, known as Dam No. 2, and in full compensation of whatever damage may be caused to the land in section 16, located above this 6-foot and below the 11-foot contour above this gate sill by reason of seepage or wave wash or other causes, containing 57 acres more or less below said 11-foot contour, to select that portion of the south half of section 9, township 23 north, range 54 west, sixth principal meridian, in Nebraska, and more particularly described as that portion south and east of Dam No. 1½ and south of the outlet channel from Dam No. 1½ to Dam No. 2, exclusive of a strip of land 50 feet in width, extending along the lower toe of Dam No. 1½ and the south water line of said outlet channel, as the same traverses the said section 9, containing 90 acres more or less, of which 67 acres more or less are irrigable, and the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to issue patent therefor: Provided, That as to the land selected which is irrigable from the project a lien shall be reserved in the patent to secure the payment in the manner and subject to the conditions specified in the act of August 9, 1912, entitled "An act providing for patents on reclamation entries, and for other purposes": Provided further, That such selection of land by said Anton Hiersche and the patenting thereof shall be a waiver to the United States of all his right to the described flooded portion of the northeast quarter of said section 16, and all claim for any damages thereto and to any land below the 11-foot contour above Lead-gate sill at Dam No. 2 on account of its use heretofore or hereafter for a reservoir. This selection of land shall furthermore be a waiver for any damage to the land so selected and patented by reason of erosion, wave wash, seepage, or sloughing along the outlet channel in section 9.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PRESSMEN IN GOVERNMENT PRINTING OFFICE.

The bill (S. 4673) to increase the compensation of pressmen in the Government Printing Office was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask that that bill be indefinitely postponed, its provisions having already been incorporated in the general deficiency appropriation bill, which is now the law.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there is no objection, the request of the Senator from Utah will be granted and the bill will be indefinitely postponed. The Chair hears none.

PAYMENT OF INDEMNITIES TO GREECE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 4527) authorizing the payment of indemnities to the Government of Greece for injuries inflicted on its nationals during riots occurring in South Omaha, Nebr., February 21, 1909. It proposes, as a matter of grace and without reference to the question of liability therefor, to the Government of Greece, to pay as full indemnity on account of injuries inflicted on its nationals during riots which occurred in South Omaha, Nebr., on February 21, 1909, as set forth in the message of the President of the United States dated January 14, 1916, $40,000.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

INDEMNITY TO MADAME CRIGNIER.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I notice that the calendar still carries Order of Business No. 467, being the bill (S. 4727) to authorize the payment to the Government of France of $13,511.13 as an indemnity requested in behalf of Madame Crignier for losses sustained by her as the result of a search for the body of Admiral John Paul Jones. That bill was passed by the Senate the last time the calendar, under Rule 8, was under consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will advise the Senator from Utah that that bill is not upon the official calendar, and is on the calendar which the Senator has apparently because of an error.

FAMILY OF TATSUJI SAITO.

The bill (S. 4728) to authorize the payment of $2,000 to the Government of Japan for the benefit of the family of Tatsuji Saito, a Japanese subject killed at Camp Geronimo, Mexico, May 25, 1916, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to pay, as a matter of grace and without reference to the question of liability therefor, to the Government of Japan $2,000, for the benefit and consolation of the family of Tatsuji Saito, a Japanese subject, killed May 25, 1916, at Camp Geronimo, Mexico, then occupied by American soldiers, as set forth in the message of the President of the United States to the Senate dated May 20, 1918.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILL PASSED OVER.

The bill (S. 2494) to provide for the exchange with the State of Oregon of certain school lands and indemnity rights within the national forests of that State for an equal area of national-forest land was announced as next in order.

Mr. LENROOT. I ask that that bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection being made, the bill will be passed over.

ATLAS LUMBER CO. AND OTHERS.

The bill (S. 4225) for the relief of the Atlas Lumber Co., Babcock & Willcox, Johnson, Jackson & Corning Co., and the C. H. Klein Brick Co., each of which companies furnished to Silas N. Opdahl, a failing Government contractor, certain building materials which were used in the construction of Burke Hall, at the Pierre Indian School, in the State of South Dakota, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The Secretary read the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, it has always been the rule of Congress not to pay interest on any claims against the Government of the United States, and I ask the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] if he will not consent that the words relating to interest, wherever they appear in the bill, be stricken out. Then I will have no objection to the bill.

Mr. KELLOGG. Very well, if that is the rule; but the Government has had this money all these years, and has had the use of it. These parties have been out of the money through the fault of the Government and not because of their own fault.

Mr. SMOOT. In the beginning it was not altogether the fault of the Government.

Mr. KELLOGG. It was absolutely the fault of the Government.

Mr. SMOOT. I think, if we pay these claims, we ought to pay them on the same basis as all other claims are paid, and I repeat that it is the rule never to pay interest on claims against the Government. I ask the Senator, therefore, to agree to strike out the words in relation to interest, and then let the bill pass.

Mr. KELLOGG. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah moves that wherever the words relating to interest appear in the bill they be stricken out. The amendments will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 3, line 8, after "$3,530.65," it is proposed to strike out the words "with interest thereon at the rate of 6 per cent per annum since the 16th day of October, 1912"; in line 12, after "$456.95," to strike out the words "with interest thereon at the rate of 6 per cent per annum since the 27th day of January, 1913"; on page 4, line 2, after "$855.94," to strike out the words "together with interest thereon at the rate of 6 per cent per annum since the 13th day of June, 1912"; and on the same page, line 7, after "$186.68," to strike out "with interest thereon at the rate of 6 per cent per annum since the 1st day of January, 1913," so as to make the bill read:

Whereas on the 26th day of July, 1911, Silas N. Opdahl entered into a contract with the Commissioner of Indian Affairs for the construction of a brick dormitory, known as Burke Hall, at the Pierre Indian School at Pierre, S. Dak., for $30,200, without requiring a bond from said Opdahl for the protection of labor and material men, as required by the act of Congress of February 24, 1905, amending the act of August 13, 1894; and

Whereas thereafter the firms and corporations hereinafter mentioned furnished building materials to said Opdahl for use in the construction of said Burke Hall upon the belief and understanding that the Commissioner of Indian Affairs had required the said Opdahl to give the bond required by law for the protection of labor and material men and without having any knowledge to the contrary; and

Whereas the said Opdahl did thereafter, to wit, on the 21st day of November, 1912, complete his said contract for the construction of said Burke Hall; and

Whereas thereafter, to wit, on the 30th day of April, 1913, the proper accounting officers of the Government, in making settlement with said Opdahl, suspended the sum of $5,688 as liquidated damages for delay on the part of said contractor in the completion of said work, and which sum was thereafter turned into the Treasury of the United States; and

Whereas the said Silas N. Opdahl ever since the said 30th day of April, 1913, has been and now is insolvent and unable to pay the firms and corporations hereinafter named which furnished him with certain building materials for the erection and construction of said Burke Hall; and

Whereas thereafter, to wit, on the 11th day of December, 1913, Babcock & Willcox instituted a suit, in the name of the United States of America, against the said Silas N. Opdahl and the American Surety Co. of New York, in their own behalf and in behalf of all other persons who supplied labor and material to said Opdahl in the construction of said Burke Hall, whose claims for labor and material were then unpaid; and

Whereas said suit has been prosecuted to final judgment and it has been adjudged and determined that the said American Surety Co. of New York was not liable to material men who furnished materials to said Opdahl under his said contract with the Government (Babcock & Willcox v. American Surety Co. of New York, 236 Fed. Rep., 340); and

Whereas the various firms and corporations hereinafter named have no relief in the premises except through and by virtue of an act of Congress: Therefore

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any moneys in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, as follows, to wit: To the Atlas Lumber Co., a West Virginia corporation, at Minneapolis, Minn., the sum of $3,530.65; to C. W. Babcock and T. B. Willcox, copartners as Babcock & Willcox, of Kasota, Minn., the sum of $456.95; to Johnson, Jackson & Corning Co., a Minnesota corporation, of Minneapolis, Minn., the sum of $855.94; and C. H. Klein and C. T. Klein, copartners as the C. H. Klein Brick Co., of Chaska, Minn., the sum of $186.68.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

STIMULATION OF AGRICULTURE.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the next business upon the calendar.

The SECRETARY. Order of Business 477, Senate bill 4146——

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, is not Order of Business 476 the next matter on the calendar?

Mr. SMOOT. That is the unfinished business.

Mr. PENROSE. Why not go on with it? I rise to a question of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Pennsylvania will state it.

Mr. PENROSE. Does the Senator from Utah object to the consideration of the unfinished business?

Mr. SMOOT. No; if the Senator wishes to go on with it.

Mr. FLETCHER. I object.

Mr. PENROSE. I think we might as well meet the question at one time as another and decide it one way or the other.

Mr. SMOOT. I think we ought to finish the calendar.

Mr. FLETCHER. I object to it. I think we ought to finish the calendar while we are on it.

Mr. PENROSE. This is on the calendar.

Mr. FLETCHER. But it can not be finished in five minutes.

Mr. PENROSE. I know that.

Mr. FLETCHER. We are proceeding under the five-minute rule.

Mr. PENROSE. I ask for the regular order, and if some Senator wants to go on record as objecting to the consideration of this bill, very well.

Mr. OVERMAN. There is an objection.

Mr. FLETCHER. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made.

Mr. PENROSE. The Senator from Florida objects, then.

LANDS IN SOUTH DAKOTA.

The bill (S. 4146) conferring jurisdiction on the Court of Claims to determine and report upon the interest, title, ownership, and right of possession of the Yankton Tribe of Indians to the Red Pipestone Quarries, S. Dak., was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It confers jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims to determine and report from the finding of facts reported by said court as authorized by section 22 of the act of April 4, 1910, the interest, title, ownership, and right of possession of the Yankton Tribe of Indians in and to the land known as the "Red Pipestone Quarries," described in said act of April 4, 1910.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SINKING FUND FOR RETIREMENT OF UNITED STATES OBLIGATIONS.

The bill (S. 108) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to use at his discretion surplus moneys in the Treasury in the purchase or redemption of the outstanding interest-bearing obligations of the United States, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It repeals all provisions of existing law requiring the establishment and maintenance of a sinking fund for the reduction of the debt of the United States, and in lieu thereof authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to use, at his discretion, the surplus moneys in the Treasury from time to time, or such portion thereof as he may deem proper, in the purchase or redemption of the outstanding interest-bearing obligations of the United States, and provides that the obligations so purchased or redeemed shall be canceled and retired, and their respective amounts shall be deducted from the outstanding principal of the public debt.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I should like to inquire whether there is any limitation upon the price at which these securities may be purchased?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I will simply say to the Senator that the bill provides that the act of 1862 shall be repealed. That act provided that a certain percentage of all the moneys collected from customs should be set aside as a sinking fund, but never since the act was passed has that provision been carried out, and the Treasury Department wants the act repealed.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. And it would really be unwise and impracticable, certainly at this time, to be laying aside a sinking fund and piling it up out of our revenues when we are compelled to increase our bonded indebtedness all the time.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that even if that law had been complied with from the day when it was passed and the 2 per cent was required to be set aside as a sinking fund from the customs duties, it would not amount to half of what the Government has purchased of its outstanding obligations.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, the title of the bill indicates another purpose than that stated by the Senator. According to the title, it is a bill to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase securities. Now, my question is this: Is he authorized to purchase the securities at a large premium, or is there any limitation upon his discretion?

Mr. SMOOT. The bill provides—

That all provisions of existing law requiring the establishment and maintenance of a sinking fund for the reduction of the debt of the United States be, and the same are hereby, repealed, and in lieu thereof the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to use at his discretion the surplus moneys in the Treasury, from time to time, or such portion thereof as he may deem proper, in the purchase or redemption of the outstanding interest-bearing obligations of the United States; and the obligations so purchased or redeemed shall be canceled and retired, and their respective amounts shall be deducted from the outstanding principal of the public debt.

That is simply carrying out what the Government of the United States has done since the passage of the act of 1862. There has been no limit, and there should be no limit, because of the fact that the prices of the Government obligations may be above par or they may be below par at the time the Government may have on hand the money to purchase the same. The Treasurer always purchases them at the very lowest point at which it is possible to purchase them at the time he has the money on hand for so doing.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I presume good judgment would be used; but it seems to me a little extraordinary that no limit should be placed upon the price that the Secretary can pay.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that there is no limit now, and this bill simply repeals that part of the present law requiring a contingent fund of 2 per cent upon the receipts from customs to be set aside year by year.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That part of it is perfectly reasonable. I can see no possible objection to that; but the title of the bill is:

A bill to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to use at his discretion surplus moneys in the Treasury in the purchase or redemption of the outstanding interest-bearing obligations of the United States.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that there is no change from the present law, so far as that part of the bill is concerned.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Then that is entirely unnecessary, if he already has that power.

Mr. SMOOT. He has it and has exercised it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think the Senator must be wrong. There must be some other reason for this, because this subject has been before the Senate on a number of occasions. It has been on the calendar many times, and has been objected to sometimes.

Mr. SMOOT. It passed the Senate once or twice.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It may have finally gone through.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that this is an administration measure, and it has been asked for by the Secretary of the Treasury for the last four or five years. If the Senator wants to object, I care nothing about it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I am not seeking to object. I am seeking for information as to why the authority is given to the Secretary of the Treasury if, as the Senator says, he already has it.

Mr. OVERMAN. It repeals one part of the present law and reenacts another part.

Mr. SMOOT. We simply repeal a part of the present law.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, let me ask the Senator a question. Under the law the 2 per cent has to be set aside from time to time. Now, technically speaking, all that money is supposed to be there, because they have not used it in taking up the bonds. As I understand, the object of this bill is to make that fund, whatever it may be, liquid, so that it can be used in the general business of the country—that is, in buying securities—instead of piling it up under the old law. Nearly all the old securities have been taken up.

Mr. SMOOT. Of course, Mr. President, this 2 per cent of the customs receipts has never been set aside in a special fund for the purpose that the law designated.

Mr. WARREN. We have had that proposition, I know, before the Appropriations Committee. It has been brought to their attention, not only four years ago, but six or eight years ago. The Treasury Department has invariably asked that this law might be changed, and it seems that we have never gotten to it.

Mr. SMOOT. The bill has passed the Senate so late in the session that it has not been acted upon by the House. If there is any objection to the consideration of the bill, Mr. President, I care nothing about it, and it can go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is in the Senate and open to amendment. If there is no amendment to be proposed, the question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ELDREDGE BROS. LIVE STOCK CO.

The bill (S. 110) for the relief of the Eldredge Bros. Live Stock Co., a corporation, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to refund to the Eldredge Bros. Live Stock Co., a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Utah, the sum of $2,738.73 and pay to said corporation the said amount out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, same being duties collected from said corporation on cattle temporarily driven into the United States from Canada.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, this bill carries no interest, does it?

Mr. SMOOT. It carries no interest on the claim. It is just what they have paid on cattle coming to this country to graze on the forest reserves and then return to Canada. Under our law the Treasury Department found that they had to pay the money, and it was paid into the Treasury.

Mr. FLETCHER. Very well.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT KNOXVILLE, TENN.

The bill (S. 2898) to provide for the erection of a public building at Knoxville, Knox County, Tenn., was announced as next in order.

Mr. LENROOT. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made, and the bill will be passed over.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator not to object to the immediate consideration of that bill. It is a very meritorious measure, providing for the erection of a post office at Knoxville in place of one that was built by the city when it had only one-third of its present population. It is a public improvement that is greatly needed, and does not involve a very large immediate expenditure of money for the purpose. I will ask the Senator to withdraw his objection.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I have read the report of the committee, and according to the report of the committee there is no greater urgency for the passage of this bill than there is in every State. Every Senator has cases of equal urgency with this. Furthermore, there is no report from the Treasury Department as to any urgency for the passage of this bill. So far as the report shows, it has not even been referred to the Treasury Department for a report as to its urgency. I am opposed to it, because if this bill should pass I have others relating to my State that ought to pass for which even a stronger showing can be made than is made upon the report of the committee with reference to this bill. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made.

Mr. SHIELDS. If the Senator from Wisconsin does not care to ask for any relief for cases in his State that require it so much more strongly than this, that is not the fault of the Senators from Tennessee. As there is an objection, Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. That can not be done under the unanimous-consent agreement, Mr. President.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is of the opinion that the motion of the Senator from Tennessee is not in order.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, if the Chair will turn to the new rule that we adopted, he will see that it expressly allows a motion to proceed to the consideration of the bill under Rule VIII.

Mr. SMOOT. Not after unanimous consent is given.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, there is not any doubt about my being right about this; and I ask for consideration of it, because in framing this rule we carefully guarded it so as not to destroy the right to proceed to the consideration of bills on motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will hear the Senator from Georgia, although the Chair has an opinion on the subject. He will hold his opinion in abeyance, however.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If the Chair will allow me just a moment——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. This new rule has just come to us on July 2. It reads as follows:

> That on Mondays the calendar shall be called under Rule VIII, and during the morning hour no motion shall be entertained to proceed to the consideration of any bill, resolution, report of a committee, or other subject upon the calendar except the motion to continue the consideration of a bill, resolution, report of a committee, or other subject against objection as provided in Rule VIII.

We expressly reserved the right to proceed as Rule VIII allows. Now, let us see what that says:

> At the conclusion of the morning business for each day, unless upon motion the Senate shall at any time otherwise order, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the calendar of bills and resolutions and continue such consideration until 2 o'clock; and bills and resolutions that are not objected to shall be taken up in their order, and each Senator shall be entitled to speak once and for five minutes only upon any question; and the objection may be interposed at any stage of the proceedings, but upon motion the Senate may continue such consideration; and this order shall commence immediately after the call—

And so forth. Rule VIII expressly provides that where objection is made the Senate may continue the consideration of a bill on motion, and our new rule applying Rule VIII for the morning hour on Monday excluded all other motions to proceed with any matter except the motion permitted by Rule VIII. We put that in particularly to preserve the right; and it is very important during these Monday mornings to handle not only those bills on the calendar to which there is no objection, but to proceed with those bills that are reached when the Senate desires to proceed with them.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, does not that relate to the situation where the consideration has already commenced?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. GORE. I should like to ask the Senator from Georgia if that rule does not relate to the situation where the consideration of the bill has already commenced?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It does this, Mr. President: Rule VIII provides for the consideration of the calendar during the morning hour. It limits you to five minutes if you proceed by unanimous consent; but if you proceed by motion over objection, then debate is broadened under Rule VIII, and you have the right at any time to proceed to the consideration of a bill in spite of the objection. Of course we usually take up business under Rule VIII by a unanimous-consent agreement to dispose of only unobjected-to business; but that is not Rule VIII itself. That is a limitation, by unanimous consent, of the provisions of Rule VIII.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, was not that very unanimous consent given this morning?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. And are we not proceeding under that?

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Georgia would be absolutely right if the unanimous consent had not been given.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the opinion of the Chair.

Mr. SMOOT. But as long as the unanimous consent was given, we ought to proceed with the calendar under Rule VIII.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The rule is suspended by unanimous consent.

Mr. SMOOT. In other words, all the rule means is that on Monday we shall have a morning hour, and that we will take up the calendar under Rule VIII and proceed with the bills, beginning with the first one on the calendar, and if there is an objection it will go over; but notwithstanding the objection, you can move to proceed with the bill, and if the Senate decides to take it up, it will take it up and discuss it. But before we began in the morning hour the Senator from Utah asked unanimous consent that we proceed with the calendar under Rule VIII, and to consider only bills to which there was no objection, and that we begin at Order of Business No. 444, and that was done.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I did not hear that part of the agreement, and I do not believe that kind of an agreement can be made in advance to cut off a bill before it is reached, when this rule expressly preserves the right during the morning hour to move to proceed to the consideration of a bill when it is reached. I did not hear that qualification of Rule VIII.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the Senator will pardon the Chair, the Chair had that in mind when the Chair made the announcement that he was of the opinion that the motion of the Senator from Tennessee was not in order. It may be that the contention of the Senator from Georgia is correct that this unanimous-consent agreement could not supersede the rule, but at the present time the Chair is of the opinion that the Senator from Utah is right.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I will not insist upon that, because we have so frequently by unanimous consent superseded this rule in that way; but we were very careful to put into this new rule a provision that would preserve the right, and the real theory of the committee in presenting the rule was that during the morning hour one day each week we should have an opportunity to take up the calendar and dispose of measures when we reached them, whether there was objection or whether there was not objection, and give us a chance to dispose of everything on the calendar.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator what is the meaning of the language of the new rule that a motion to proceed with the consideration of a bill shall not be in order? What is the meaning of that?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It is this, that no motion shall be in order to proceed with any resolution or any matter pending before the Senate until we take up the Regular Calendar under Rule VIII, and then we take the bills up as we reach them. It defeats the effort by motion to bring up something before we reach the calendar or something that defeats the regular call of the calendar. It forces us to the calendar every Monday morning and to call bills in order on the calendar, with the privilege to move to the consideration of an objected bill when it is reached.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

STIMULATION OF AGRICULTURE.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 11945) to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to carry out, during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, the purposes of the act entitled "An act to provide further for the national security and defense by stimulating agriculture and facilitating the distribution of agricultural products."

Mr. OVERMAN. I ask the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD] if he will not let the unfinished business be laid aside temporarily until we finish the calendar. We lack only five or six numbers of concluding it and would like to finish it.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I wish to state that the chairman of the committee is now in charge of the bill.

Mr. GORE. I have no objection to that course if it does not last very long.

Mr. OVERMAN. There is just one more page of the calendar.

Mr. GORE. Then I ask that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside until the calendar is completed, but I reserve the right to call it up should the consideration of the calendar be protracted.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator can call it up at any time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection made to the request by the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. LENROOT. I reserve the right to object until I make an inquiry. I should like to know what the ruling was upon the motion of the Senator from Tennessee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair ruled that the motion of the Senator from Tennessee was not in order.

Mr. LENROOT. Very well.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT KNOXVILLE, TENN.

Mr. McKELLAR. I desire to give notice that at the very first opportunity the bill (S. 2898) to provide for the erection of a public building at Knoxville, Knox County, Tenn., will be called up.

ALBERT H. CAMPBELL.

The bill (S. 1661) for the relief of Albert H. Campbell was announced as next in order on the calendar.

Mr. OVERMAN. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made, and the bill will go over.

DISCHARGES FROM MILITARY OR NAVAL SERVICE.

The bill (S. 3995) to amend section 224 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to certificates of discharge, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment on page 2, line 5, after the word "man," to strike out "or his widow or legal representatives" and insert "or, if he be dead, then to his widow, or, if she be dead, then to his oldest surviving child," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 224 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 224. Whenever satisfactory proof shall be furnished to the War Department or the Navy Department that any officer or enlisted man who has been or shall hereafter be honorably discharged from the military or naval service of the United States has lost his certificate of discharge, or the same has been destroyed without his privity or procurement, the Secretary of War as to such officer or enlisted man in the Army, and the Secretary of the Navy as to such officer or enlisted man in the Navy, shall be authorized to furnish such officer or enlisted man, or, if he be dead, then to his widow, or, if she be dead, then to his oldest surviving child, a certificate of such discharge, to be indelibly marked so that it may be known as a certificate in lieu of a lost or destroyed discharge: Provided, That such certificate shall not be accepted as a voucher for the payment of any claim against the United States for pay, bounty, or other allowance, or as evidence in any other case."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SALARY OF COLLECTOR OF CUSTOMS IN NORTH CAROLINA.

The bill (S. 4739) to fix the annual salary of the collector of customs for the district of North Carolina was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and it was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the salary of the collector of customs for the district of North Carolina is hereby fixed at $5,000 per annum.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

AMENDMENT OF SHIPPING ACT.

The bill (H. R. 12100) to amend the act approved September 7, 1916, entitled "An act to establish a United States Shipping Board for the purpose of encouraging, developing, and creating a naval auxiliary and naval reserve and a merchant marine to meet the requirements of the commerce of the United States with its Territories and possessions and with foreign countries; to regulate carriers by water in the foreign and interstate commerce of the United States, and for other purposes," was announced as next in order, and the Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

Mr. PENROSE. In order to save further time of the Senate by continuing the reading of the bill, I object to its present consideration, not because I am at the present time opposed to the measure, but it is a very important bill and I think we ought to have an opportunity to look into it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made, and the bill goes over.

Mr. FLETCHER. Is it not too late to make an objection after the bill has been under consideration?

Mr. PENROSE. No; it was being read for information.

Mr. FLETCHER. It was taken up regularly and is under consideration.

Mr. PENROSE. An objection can be entered at any time. A Senator can not know what is in a bill by the title. It has to be read and then an objection lies.

Mr. FLETCHER. I regret that the Senator insists on his objection. It is a very important bill, reported unanimously by both the committee of the House and the Senate. It simply refers to the control of the transfer of vessels being built——

Mr. PENROSE. I concede all that the Senator says, but certainly he will not grudge me the short opportunity to examine the measure, and we will be in continuous session from now until October.

Mr. FLETCHER. I do not know about that, but this is a matter that has been before the Senate ever since the 27th of June. A report has been made; the bill is here; we had it up Saturday, more or less. I think it has been pretty well considered. There is nothing complicated about it. It was reported unanimously by the committees of both Houses after thorough consideration.

Mr. PENROSE. It is a House bill?

Mr. FLETCHER. It is a House bill.

Mr. PENROSE. With great reluctance I will withdraw my objection. I have voted for so many questionable measures in the last six months perhaps one more will not weigh upon my conscience nor require a greater reckoning in the day of judgment.

Mr. FLETCHER. I thank the Senator. I assure him that it is a very desirable measure.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Commerce with amendments.

The first amendment was, in section 4, page 5, line 23, after "United States," to insert "without expressly stipulating that such construction shall not begin until after the war or emergency proclaimed by the President has ended."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 4, page 7, line 13, after "United States," to insert "unless the person to whom the consideration was paid, or in whose interest it was deposited, entered into the transaction in the honest belief that the person who paid or deposited such consideration was a citizen of the United States."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 7, line 24, after the word "forfeiture," to strike out "or," so as to read:

SEC. 39. That in any action or proceeding under the provisions of this act to enforce a forfeiture the conviction in a court of criminal jurisdiction of any person for a violation thereof with respect to the subject of the forfeiture shall constitute prima facie evidence of such violation against the person so convicted.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 4, page 8, line 23, after the word "by," to insert "said," so as to read:

SEC. 41. That whenever by said sections 9 or 37 the approval of the board is required to render any act or transaction lawful, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I wish to ask the Senator from Florida whether this bill was prepared in the committee or in one of the departments?

Mr. FLETCHER. It was prepared in the House committee after a very full hearing.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Is it a unanimous report of the committee?

Mr. FLETCHER. It is a unanimous report.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It is a very comprehensive measure. I have not had time to go through it carefully. If it is the unanimous report of the committee I shall not interpose any objection.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

EXPULSION OF ANARCHISTS.

The bill (H. R. 12402) to exclude and expel from the United States aliens who are members of the anarchistic and similar classes was announced as next in order, and the Secretary read the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. The other day when this bill was reported to the Senate and unanimous consent asked for its consideration the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] objected to its present consideration, and while he was on his feet he also made the statement, as I remember, that he desired when the bill was up for consideration to make some remarks upon it. Does the Senator from Oklahoma remember that as I remember it?

Mr. GORE. I remember the Senator from Idaho interposed an objection. His point went to the fact as to what provision would be made for passing on the liability of aliens to be subjected to deportation under the act. I might say that this makes no change in the existing law in that regard.

Mr. REED. Is it to be passed on by the immigration officer?

Mr. GORE. Yes, sir; just as it is now, and as it has been ever since the first immigration act was passed.

Mr. REED. But the Senator understands that the law now contemplates the expulsion of a man from the country upon the mere finding of the immigration officer, no matter how long the man has been here.

Mr. GORE. So far as the enumerated classes are concerned that is true. There are only two or three changes in this act, perhaps I ought to state, as compared with the present law. The present law limits the power to deport to five years, except in cases relating to the white-slave traffic. Sexually immoral cases are subject to deportation at any time. This measure seeks to place anarchists and the enumerated class in the same category with those engaged in the white-slave traffic.

There is one other change. Under the existing law a man must have been an anarchist when he came here. This subjects him to deportation if he became an anarchist or if the fact became known subsequent to his entry into the United States.

So far as deportation is concerned, it would continue to be done as it is now and as it always has been since the first immigration law was passed.

Mr. SMOOT. I think under the circumstances, as there seems to be a misunderstanding or a difference of opinion as to what the bill is, I will ask that it may go over until the Senator from Idaho can be present.

Mr. GORE. I should like to ask the Senator if he knows when the Senator from Idaho will be back?

Mr. SMOOT. I am quite sure he is in the city now, but I take it for granted he is on official business somewhere and he is absent from the Chamber. I will see if the Senator from Idaho can be found and notified to come into the Chamber. I ask the Senator to allow the bill to go over, and if the Senator from Idaho returns before we get through with the calendar we can revert to it.

Mr. GORE. I have no desire to take advantage of the Senator's absence, but I will say in this connection since I made the effort a few days ago to bring up the bill I have received a letter from the Secretary of Labor expressing a very urgent desire that it shall be passed. There are a great many obnoxious aliens it seems who can not be deported under existing law.

Mr. SMOOT. Let us go through with the bills on the calendar, and in the meantime, if the Senator from Idaho comes in, I will ask that we return to the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be temporarily passed over.

Mr. REED. I wish to suggest to the Senator in charge of the bill that the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] yesterday asked that this bill might have due consideration. While, of course, we all abhor the introduction into this country of an alien who is an anarchist, a judicial ascertainment ought to be made of the fact. I think that is a point which is very worthy of consideration. Under the present law or custom an immigration officer may render a decision which involves the right of a human being, and that immigration officer may be ignorant of law, he may refuse anything like a fair hearing, and I believe the courts have held that there is no appeal from his decision; that is to say, his decision will not be interfered with by the courts. I think that is the decision.

Mr. GORE. I will say to the Senator that since section 18 of the act was revised February 5 last the finding of the Secretary of Labor is final, but I think the alien can have a writ of habeas corpus.

Mr. REED. A writ of habeas corpus can not be determined on the merit of the decision.

Mr. GORE. No; nor the legality of the decision.

Mr. REED. Provided there be jurisdiction to render judgment or perform the act the writ will not lie. It lies only where there is something lacking in jurisdiction. As far as I am concerned, I want to say this one word: I think there ought to be in the bill before it is passed a provision giving the right of appeal to a court so that the court may pass upon the merits of the matter.

I wish to call the attention of the chairman of the committee to one thing further. I have had but little time to examine this bill, but I am afraid it is so drawn that a man who would seek to overthrow the Government of Austria or Germany or Turkey might be within its terms. I have read it very hastily, and I may be in error. I think the bill needs some careful consideration on the two points I have suggested. Therefore, I hope it will not be hurried through even if the Secretary of Labor is in a hurry.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I will say that I have no desire to press the consideration of the bill before the Senate unduly, but I understand there are a number of aliens in the country who would be subject to the provisions of this act, and it is claimed that they are a considerable source of trouble, industrially and otherwise. Of that I have no knowledge of my own. But to provide for a trial by jury when an alien is subjected to deportation under the right of the Secretary of Labor would revolutionize the whole immigration system.

Mr. REED. It needs it.

Mr. GORE. That is not the law now and never has been. Of course, an alien is not here as a matter of right but as a matter of courtesy, as a sort of matter of grace, with certain limitations, perhaps, under treaties.

Mr. PENROSE. If the bill goes over on objection, what is the use of discussing it?

Mr. GORE. I was answering the point raised by the Senator from Missouri.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JONES of New Mexico in the chair). The bill goes over on objection.

ESTATE OF MOSES M. BANE.

The bill (S. 2885) for the relief of the estate of Moses M. Bane was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to the estate of Moses M. Bane, deceased, who was receiver of public moneys for the Territory of Utah, and paid office rent at Salt Lake City for the years 1877 and 1878 and for the first quarter of the years 1878 and 1879, the sum of $1,080, the said sum for office rent having been advanced by the officer out of his private means.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HORACE A. CHOUMARD.

The bill (S. 4562) to reimburse Horace A. Choumard, chaplain in Twenty-third Infantry, for loss of certain personal property was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment, page 1, line 7 to strike out "$1,924.35" and insert "$1,500," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Horace A. Choumard, chaplain in Twenty-third Infantry, or his duly authorized representative, the sum of $1,500, the same being in full for and the receipt of the same to be taken and accepted as a full and final release and discharge of the claim of the said Horace A. Choumard for reimbursement for certain personal property lost in the flood and storm at Texas City, Tex., on the 16th and 17th days of August, 1915, without fault or neglect on his part and while in the military service of the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KING. I should like to ask if there was a unanimous report in favor of this bill?

Mr. McKELLAR. I will say to the Senator it is a unanimous report from the Committee on Claims. It changes the amount from $1,924.35 to $1,500, and is a unanimous report. It is a very worthy case. It has been recommended by the War Department, and the bill ought to pass.

Mr. KING. May I ask the Senator from Tennessee if the general statute which has passed recently giving jurisdiction to determine losses on the part of military and naval employees of the Government would not be sufficiently broad to provide for this case?

Mr. McKELLAR. By a ruling of the Treasury Department it does not cover a case of this kind. The bill is recommended by the department, I will state further to the Senator, after an investigation.

Mr. KING. In view of the statement of the Senator from Tennessee I shall make no objection to the consideration of the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WALSTON H. BROWN.

The bill (S. 4460) for the relief of Walston H. Brown, sole surviving partner of the firm of Brown, Howard & Co., and of the Philadelphia & Reading Coal & Iron Co. was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Walston H. Brown, sole surviving partner of the firm of Brown, Howard & Co., the sum of $65,792.53, and to the Philadelphia & Reading Coal & Iron Co., the sum of $26,400.30, these being the amounts severally found due the said Walston H. Brown, sole surviving partner of the firm of Brown, Howard & Co., and the Philadelphia & Reading Coal & Iron Co., by the Court of Claims, and transmitted to Congress on the 7th day of February, 1914.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ABANDONED LIGHTHOUSE AND LIFE-SAVING STATIONS.

The bill (S. 4679) to provide for the disposition of abandoned lighthouse and life-saving stations was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That where reservations of the public lands for lighthouse or life-saving purposes are no longer needed for such purposes the Secretary of the Interior may cause any of such reservations or part thereof to be surveyed into urban, suburban, or villa lots or tracts of suitable size and fix by appraisement of disinterested persons their cash value, and offer the same for sale at public outcry to the highest bidder on such terms as the Secretary of the Interior may direct, and thence afterwards the unsold lots shall be subject to sale at private entry according to such terms and regulations as he may prescribe, but no lots shall be disposed of at public sale or private entry for less than the appraised value thereof, and all such sales shall be conducted by a superintendent of sale to be appointed by the Secretary of the Interior or by the register and receiver of the land office in the district in which the reserves may be situate, in accordance with instructions of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, approved by the Secretary of the Interior.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

YOSEMITE STONE CO.

The bill (S. 4742) for the relief of the Yosemite Stone Co. was considered as in Committee of the Whole and was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized to issue a patent to the Yosemite Stone Co., a corporation organized under the laws of Arizona, for the northeast quarter southwest quarter section 13, township 4 south, range 15 east, Mount Diablo meridian, Sacramento, Cal., land district: Provided, That such patent shall contain a reservation to the United States and its authorized permittees, licensees, or lessees of the sole right to enter upon, occupy, and use any part or all of such land reasonably necessary for the accomplishment of all purposes connected with the development, generation, transmission, or utilization of hydroelectric power or energy.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOHN MURPHY.

The bill (S. 560) to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of John Murphy was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, and benefits upon honorably discharged soldiers, their widows and dependent relatives, John Murphy, who was a private in Company F, Second Regiment Virginia Volunteer Cavalry, subsequently known as Company F, Second Regiment West Virginia Volunteer Cavalry, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been discharged honorably from the military service of the United States as a private of said company and regiment on the 30th day of June, 1865.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill for the relief of John Murphy."

EXPULSION OF ANARCHISTS.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, during my absence a few moments ago, while the Senate was proceeding under Rule VIII, the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] objected to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12402) to exclude and expel from the United States aliens who are members of the anarchistic and similar classes, because he understood I had some objection to the bill, and that I desired not to have it considered in my absence. I appreciate the thoughtfulness of the Senator from Utah, but I desire to say that, if the bill should be now called up or called up later, I do not desire longer to be considered as opposing the hearing of the bill. I do not desire it to be understood that I am in favor of the bill, but I am willing that it shall be considered and disposed of.

STIMULATION OF AGRICULTURE.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 11945) to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to carry out, during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, the purposes of the act entitled "An act to provide further for the national security and defense by stimulating agriculture and facilitating the distribution of agricultural products."

Mr. SMOOT. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bankhead	Gore	Nelson	Sheppard
Beckham	Hale	New	Sherman
Benet	Henderson	Norris	Shields
Borah	Hitchcock	Nugent	Smith, Ariz.
Brandegee	Johnson, Cal.	Overman	Smith, Md.

Fernald	King	Poindexter	Underwood
Fletcher	Lenroot	Ransdell	Vardaman
France	Lewis	Reed	Walsh
Frelinghuysen	McKellar	Saulsbury	Warren
Gerry	Myers	Shafroth

Mr. SHAFROTH. I desire to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. THOMAS] on official business.

Mr. McKELLAR. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. KIRBY] on official business.

Mr. LEWIS. I wish to announce the absence of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES] from personal illness, and of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] because of a death in his family.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Fifty-five Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, in a moment I shall ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of unobjected committee amendments to the bill. In the meantime I wish to say that on page 6 of the bill is the so-called Jones-Norris amendment, in relation to prohibition; and I am directed by the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry to bring in a committee substitute for that amendment as printed in the bill. I ask to have the substitute read, in order that it may be printed and lie on the table, and also in order that Senators who are interested in it may have an opportunity to examine it.

Mr. WARREN. Let me suggest to the chairman of the committee that I think the bill ought to be read in full when it comes to its reading.

Mr. GORE. It has been read in full.

Mr. WARREN. At what time?

Mr. GORE. On Saturday night last.

Mr. WARREN. Was the bill read before these later amendments were offered?

Mr. PENROSE. The bill was read fully on Saturday night. Let the amendment which is now offered be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the amendment now offered by the Senator from Oklahoma.

The SECRETARY. In lieu of the amendment of the committee as printed in the bill and found on pages 6 and 7, which is known as the prohibition amendment, it is proposed, on page 6, line 11, after "$6,100,000," to strike out the remainder of the paragraph and insert the following:

That after December 31, 1918, until the conclusion of the present war, for the purpose of conserving the man power of the Nation and to increase efficiency in the production of arms, war munitions, ships, food, and clothing for the Army and Navy, it shall be unlawful to sell for beverage purposes any distilled spirits, and during said time no distilled spirits held in bond shall be removed therefrom for beverage purposes except for export. After November 1, 1918, until the conclusion of the present war, no grain, cereal, fruit, or other food product shall be used in the manufacture or production of beer, wine, or other intoxicating malt or vinous liquor for beverage purposes. After December 31, 1918, until the conclusion of the present war, no beer, wine, or other intoxicating malt or vinous liquor shall be sold for beverage purposes except for export. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue is hereby authorized and directed to prescribe rules and regulations, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, in regard to the removal of distilled spirits held in bond after December 31, 1918, for other than beverage purposes; also in regard to the sale and distribution of wine for sacramental, medicinal, or other nonbeverage uses. After the approval of this act no distilled, malt, vinous, or other intoxicating liquors shall be imported into the United States.

Any person who violates any of the foregoing provisions shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof, shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $1,000 or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or both.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, as chairman of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, and under the direction of the committee, I ask to perfect the amendment as printed in the bill by substituting the amendment just read. Then the amendment will lie on the table, subject to inspection and consideration in due course, and will come up in its regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I now ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of unobjected committee amendments to the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of unobjected amendments to the bill.

Mr. PENROSE. I rise to an inquiry. Is it the intention of the Senator from Oklahoma to abandon the consideration of the Agricultural bill at this time?

Mr. GORE. Oh, no. I will say to the Senator my request was that we now consider the unobjected committee amendments to the bill.

Mr. PENROSE. I misunderstood the Senator.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I present two resolutions in behalf of the prohibition amendment and letters transmitting them. I ask that they may be inserted in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it will be so ordered. The Chair hears none.

The papers referred to are as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., June 6, 1918.

To the UNITED STATES SENATE,
Washington, D. C.:

As chairman of the commission on temperance and social service of the general conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, in accordance with the instructions of that conference, I herewith transmit to your honorable body a copy of the resolutions adopted by the unanimous rising vote of the conference on May 18, 1918.

Very respectfully,

JAMES CANNON, Jr.,
Chairman of Commission on Temperance and Social Service of the Methodist Episcopal Church South.

[Extract from the report of the committee on temperance and social service of the general conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, adopted at its session in Atlanta, Ga., May 18, 1918, and sent by order of the conference to the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States with the request that it be read on the floor of each House of Congress, and be entered upon the record of each body as the petition of the representatives of over two and one-quarter million of members of said church.]

This general conference most earnestly petitions Congress to press speedily such legislation as will absolutely prohibit the sale of all kinds of intoxicants for beverage purposes during the period of the war and demobilization thereafter.

We rejoice in the patriotic response of the young men of our Nation to fight the battles of freedom and righteousness. We believe that these choice young men should receive not only food and clothing, and as many comforts as can be afforded them while they are performing their duty to their country and to the world, but that they should also be protected as far as possible from the temptations to dissipation and vice which are so common in camp life. We insist, therefore, that the standard adopted by the Congress of the United States in the passage of the protective law prohibiting the sale of intoxicants to soldiers and sailors in uniform, and the practice of prostitution in the zone of the military and navy camps be maintained without change for our soldiers and sailors in whatever part of the world they may be. Gen. Pershing's order No. 77, "forbidding the soldiers either to buy or to accept as gifts whisky, brandy, champagne, liquors, or other alcoholic beverages other than light wines or beer," should be strengthened at once by striking out the exemption as to light wines and beer, thus prohibiting the purchase, possession, or acceptance as a gift of all kinds of intoxicating liquors, and a similar order should be issued for our naval forces. In order that the law for the Army and Navy at home and abroad shall rest on the same basis of authority, it is further recommended that this order be embodied in a law to be passed by Congress, either in connection with some appropriate bill pending before Congress or as a separate statute. We insist that there shall be no hesitation and no delay in issuing this order and in passing this legislation, as such action will prevent the formation of European wine-drinking habits by American soldiers and sailors, the purchase of strong liquors under the cloak of the wine bottle, and would result in a still greater reduction in sexual vice. We furthermore urge that our Government, either through the Department of State or through the military and naval authorities, request the Governments of Great Britain and France to issue an administrative order prohibiting the sale of intoxicants by residents of these countries to American soldiers and sailors in uniform in deference to the standards concerning intoxicants and prostitution which have been established by the United States Government for her Army and Navy.

WASHINGTON, D. C., June 7, 1918.

To the Senate of the United States, Washington, D. C.:

As chairman and secretary of the legislative committee of the Anti-Saloon League of America, in accordance with instructions of the executive committee of the league, we herewith transmit to your honorable body copy of the resolutions adopted by the executive committee on May 24, 1918.

Very respectfully,

JAMES CANNON, Jr., Chairman.
WAYNE B. WHEELER, Secretary.
Legislative Committee of the Anti-Saloon League of America.

[Resolutions adopted by the executive committee of the Anti-Saloon League of America at Oberlin, Ohio, on May 24, 1918, and ordered to be transmitted to the Senate of the United States by the legislative committee of the league.]

1. Resolved, Conditions confronting the Nation to-day emphasize the necessity for war-time prohibition as has been demanded by the moral forces of the Nation for the past year. The executive committee of the Anti-Saloon League of America, in harmony with the action taken by the national convention of the league, and similar action taken by affiliated bodies, therefore insists that such legislation should be speedily adopted by the Congress of the United States.

2. Resolved, In view of the conditions surrounding our soldiers and sailors in foreign lands we insist that the standard adopted by the Congress of the United States in the passage of the protective law, prohibiting the sale of intoxicants to soldiers and sailors in uniform, be maintained for our soldiers and sailors in whatever part of the world they may be.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, do I understand that the committee amendment just read by the Secretary is to go over until to-morrow?

Mr. GORE. It lies on the table, and will be taken up in regular order.

Mr. PHELAN. And not necessarily go over until to-morrow?

Mr. GORE. Oh, no. It may be reached to-day or possibly it may be reached to-morrow; but it will come up at the same time that the proposition which is printed in the bill for which it is substituted would have come up. It is merely in order to give Senators an opportunity to examine it that I bring it in at this time.

Mr. PHELAN. There is no printed copy of the amendment?

Mr. GORE. No, sir; there is not.

Mr. PHELAN. Nor a typewritten copy of it?

Mr. GORE. I think not. I will say to the Senator, however, that the principal change made is in reducing the time from June 30, 1919, to December 31, 1918. There may be some other changes, but that is the principal change.

Mr. PHELAN. That is, reducing the time one-half?

Mr. GORE. Yes, sir.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator from Oklahoma what his understanding is of the parliamentary status of the proposed amendment which he has just presented on behalf of the committee? He speaks of it as lying on the table. I do not understand whether he wishes it substituted for the amendment which the committee formerly recommended and whether it has been so substituted, or whether it lies upon the table.

Mr. GORE. That has been done. It has been substituted and is pending in lieu of the other amendment.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Then it is not on the table, is it?

Mr. GORE. Well, what I meant to say was that it might lie over, subject to being reached in the due consideration of the bill.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It will be considered as a committee amendment, will it not?

Mr. GORE. Yes, sir; as the other would have been. I thought Senators ought to have an opportunity to examine it, and so I have presented it in advance.

Mr. PENROSE. It would have been well if the Committee on Agriculture had ordered this important amendment to be printed in time for this session of the Senate, and I suggest that the Secretary of the Senate send the amendment immediately to the Public Printing Office with a view to having copies furnished Senators in the next hour or so, perhaps.

Mr. GORE. If that can be done, I hope it will be done. I think the Senator's request is a very reasonable one.

Mr. PENROSE. I would be glad if the Chair would order the Secretary to have this amendment sent immediately to the Printing Office, with a direction to have copies returned to the Senate as early as possible.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair, of course, would follow any order of the Senate. The Chair understands that this is a substitute amendment for that heretofore reported by the committee, and therefore should be printed in the bill in italic in the same way other amendments are printed. Now, is it the wish of the Senate that the bill shall be reprinted throughout with this amendment substituted?

Mr. GORE. I do not think that will be necessary.

Mr. PENROSE. That would take unnecessary time. I think it will be sufficient if we can get the amendment printed. That will take very much less time and labor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That being the understanding, the Chair will direct the Secretary to forward the amendment to the Public Printer, to be printed at once.

Mr. GORE. I will say to the Senator from Pennsylvania that the reason it has not been printed earlier is that it has only been agreed upon since noon, the committee having met at 11 o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understood there was no objection to proceeding in the order suggested by the Senator with unobjected committee amendments. The Chair hears no objection, and that procedure will be followed. The Secretary will state the first committee amendment.

The first amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was, on page 2, line 4, after the word "indicated," to strike out:

Provided, That no part of the money hereby appropriated shall be used in paying salary or expenses of any man who on account of employment in which he is or may be engaged under the provisions of this act has been or shall hereafter be certified by the Secretary of Agriculture, or by any other official of the Department of Agriculture, for deferred classification, or by action of any other Federal official or authority has been or may hereafter be placed in a deferred class under act No. 12, Sixty-fifth Congress, entitled "An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States," approved May 18, 1917, or under any act amendatory thereof that has been or shall hereafter be enacted.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I presume that it would be in order to perfect the House text before the vote is had upon striking that language from the bill?

Mr. SHEPPARD. If this amendment is objected to it merely goes over, does it not?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That will be the case under the order of the Senate.

Mr. GORE. The amendment relates to deferred classification, as I understand?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I desire to ascertain whether it is the understanding of the Senator from Oklahoma that a single objection on the part of any Senator to any committee amendment sends it over and prevents action upon it?

Mr. GORE. Yes, sir; until we finish those that are not objected to; that is the customary procedure.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Very well.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I do not believe the Senator from Oklahoma will gain very much by not proceeding in the ordinary way and taking up the amendments as they are reached. I fear there is going to be quite a general objection to nearly all of the features of this bill.

Mr. GORE. I will say that we can clean up the few amendments that are not objected to. Of course, that will require their reading.

Mr. PENROSE. There will be very few to which there is no objection, and perhaps it will not take much time to read them.

Mr. GORE. I think it will not take much time.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, before I vote upon the proposition to strike out this clause inserted by the House, and which has relation to the exemption from military service of men serving in the Agricultural Department, I should like to have some reason offered for striking out the provision. The House must have had some reason for putting it in, and it is perfectly plain to me that there ought to be some reason given for striking it out.

Mr. PENROSE. I can give the Senator one reason. It takes a young man fleet of foot to catch coyotes or squirrels and investigate their habits. A man beyond the military age might be unable to perform those important duties, for which nearly a million dollars is appropriated.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I rise to a point of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state it.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I make the point that debate is out of order for the present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is unable to determine without hearing Senators whether or not objection is made which, under the order of the Senate, can send the amendment over.

Mr. PENROSE. I object to that amendment very emphatically.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Then, under the order of the Senate, the amendment will not now be considered. The Secretary will state the next amendment reported by the committee.

The next amendment reported by the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was, on page 3, line 7, after the word "furnishing," to strike out "seeds" and insert "seed wheat and beans," so as to read:

Second. For procuring, storing, and furnishing seed wheat and beans, as authorized by section 3 of the act, the appropriations for said purposes of $2,500,000 in section 8 of the act and $4,000,000 under the heading "Department of Agriculture" in the act approved March 28, 1918, entitled "An act making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, and prior fiscal years, on account of war expenses, and for other purposes," shall be available until the date when said act of August 10, 1917, shall cease to be in effect, etc.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I wish to call attention to a situation throughout the country with reference to the subject which is mentioned in this amendment. While it has no particular bearing upon the amendment, it may as well be disposed of now as at some other time. As a basis for the remarks that I desire to make, I call attention to a letter which I have before me and which I have received from Mr. I. B. Evans, a leading citizen of Preston, Idaho. I ask particularly the attention of those who have given consideration to the Food Administration law and its operation, for, if the power does not exist to deal with this situation, that power ought to be granted, and perhaps we could insert a clause in this bill which would remedy the situation. This letter is dated Preston, Idaho, June 30, 1918, and is, in part, as follows:

DEAR SIR:

* * * * * * *

I desire to call your attention to the food conditions here in Preston, and I believe the same conditions exist in the other parts of this State. I went to the store the other day to buy 50 pounds of flour, and here is what I paid: Flour, straight grade, $2.45 per 50 pounds. With this I had to buy 50 pounds of substitutes at the following prices: Rice, 15 cents per pound; corn meal, 9 cents per pound; beans, 15 cents per pound; rye flour, 10 cents per pound; oatmeal, 10 cents per pound. It takes about $8 cash to get 50 pounds of flour, or if a person wants 100 pounds of flour it will cost him $16.

That is, Mr. President, because of the fact that in buying 50 or 100 pounds of flour the purchaser is compelled, under the food-administration regulations, also to buy substitutes at these enormous prices—

This is working a hardship on a great many people. Besides it would not be so bad to use substitutes if they could be bought for the same price as flour, but to pay twice as much for an inferior article at best makes a fellow feel as though there is something radically wrong.

The letter further discusses the situation, but the portion of the letter which I have read states the matter fully, and the same statement is coming to me in different ways from all parts of the country.

As I understand, Mr. President, the Food Administration have the same power under the food-control act to fix the price of substitutes that they have to fix the price of the articles the price of which they are fixing. There seems to be an impression throughout the country that the reason why the prices for substitutes are not controlled or fixed is that there is no power conferred upon the Food Administration to fix such prices, but, if I am not in error—and if I am in error I shall be glad to be corrected—there is the same power to fix the price of the substitutes as they are using to fix the price of other articles. I do not say that this power is conferred by the law, but, whether it is conferred or assumed, the same power ought to be exercised in relation to the price of substitutes as they have exercised in connection with the price of other articles. I do not criticize the assumption of power at this time. I only urge that, however the power is derived, it is as full and complete to fix the price of these substitutes as it is to fix the price of the other articles or commodities.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HITCHCOCK in the chair). Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, my information is that the Food Administration gave out a statement, perhaps in February or March last, that the reason the price was not fixed on the substitutes was that the food-control act did not confer that power upon the Food Administration. The Senator has stated the proposition with precision. There is exactly the same power to fix the price of the substitutes as there is to fix the price of wheat flour. There is no power to do either; it is a usurpation of power. And not only that, but it is the worst sort of economy, for it obliges people to clutter up their shelves with stuff they do not want, which means the wasteful use of it; and, more than that, it increases the price of the articles for which an artificial demand is created and raises the price of those articles to the people who do actually need them, who want them, and desire to buy them.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I think a word ought to be said in this immediate connection in justice to the Food Administration. I do not feel called upon particularly to come to their defense, but I think that they have accomplished a great deal of good and that they are not subject to the charge as made by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE]. I do not understand that they have usurped any authority in the matter of fixing the price of wheat. The fact of the case is that the Food Administration, so far as I know, has not done anything more in regard to wheat than the Senator from Oklahoma can do; that is, offer a certain price which he will pay for wheat that he will buy. That is what the Food Administration has done in regard to wheat, and that is the only price fixing which has been undertaken. There is no prohibition in any regulation of the Food Administration against anybody selling his wheat at a less price or a higher price than that which the Government will pay for it.

I intended a moment later to make some comment on the subject of which the Senator from Idaho is speaking, but I will defer that until he has finished.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I should like to say that I think the Senator from Washington is approximately correct in his statement. I think the Food Administration has mocked the calamities of the farmer—the calamities which it has imposed upon him—by saying to the farmer, "If you are not willing to take $2.20 for your wheat, or $1.95, or $2, you can sell to anybody that will buy and pay you more." I think that is true; but the Food Administration has licensed all the wheat dealers in the United States and will—or would until recently—revoke the license of any wheat dealer in the United States who would pay one penny more for wheat than the price prescribed by the Food Administration. Certainly the farmer can sell to anybody who will pay more; but men who are in the business are forbidden to pay more, upon the penalty of having their licenses forfeited. Not only that, but the Government, through this administration, has been handling the entire wheat of the country—not merely the wheat desired for the allies, not merely the wheat desired for the armies, but wheat desired for millers, except in certain exceptional cases—and, generally speaking, the entire crop of 1917 was handled through licensed dealers, and they were forbidden, upon penalty of forfeiture of their licenses, to pay one penny more than the prescribed price. I thought that the Food Administration was not quite ingenuous with the farmers when it mocked them by saying, "Sell at any price you can get. We place no limitation upon your receiving $3; certainly not." But who can pay it, and who will pay it when he knows that he can obtain it at the fixed price?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, my understanding is that under the license clause of the Food Administration act they have taken possession of the wheat market entirely, and, while they have not directly asserted the power to fix the prices, they have indirectly accomplished the same thing; but with that I am not now going to quarrel, nor am I going to discuss it. What I submit to the Senator from Washington is this: Would there be any different reason why the Food Administrator should not control the price of these substitutes the same as he does control the price of wheat? There would be no reason why he should not exercise whatever that power is, whether it is directly and properly exercised or not, or whether it is encompassed by a roundabout way or not; yet he could deal with the other situation, as I understand it, precisely the same as he deals with wheat, if he desired to do so.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I entirely agree with the Senator from Idaho in that respect. I know that the Food Administration, or somebody connected with it, has answered the innumerable complaints throughout the country—I know there have been many of them in the West and, I assume, in other parts of the country—directed to the enormous prices of substitute flours, flours recommended to be substituted for white flour, and complaints directed against speculation and profiteering in those food or bread substitutes, by saying that they have no authority to fix a price. I have investigated the matter somewhat, and I entirely agree with the Senator from Idaho that while there is no specific authority to fix prices they have the same means by which they can control speculation and profiteering and extortionate prices that they have as to wheat or any other food products which they control and regulate, and I think that is particularly true under section 5 of this act.

If the Senator will pardon me for interrupting him just a little further, he may have noticed in the local newspapers in Washington City a schedule of prices, published as an advertisement by the Food Administration or some agent of the Food Administration, in which they gave the wholesale prices for these substitute flours, and in a parallel column what they recommended as a reasonable retail price, and in the advertisement requested any customer or citizen to report to the Food Administration any greater charge or extortionate prices that retailers were receiving or demanding for these foods. I have received a large number of complaints from the State of Washington, where the conditions are a good deal as they are in the State of Idaho, on this same subject, and I entertain the same views in regard to it that the Senator from Idaho has expressed. I will add that I have taken it up a number of times with the Food Administration and urged them to take some action, and if I recollect clearly my correspondence with them, they stated to me that they had no authority to fix prices. I insisted that they did have authority to control it, and I believe that now they are proceeding to undertake to control these prices, and recently they have informed me that just as soon as the measures which they have taken begin to operate these prices will come down. Whether or not they will be successful I do not know.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, reading another paragraph from this letter, the writer says:

There is another thing I desire to call your attention to, and that is this: People are getting loaded up with substitutes, as it is almost impossible to eat them with the 50 pounds of flour.

If a price can be placed on wheat by the Government, why is not a price placed by it on the substitutes? Until this is done, what is there to prevent the substitutes from going still higher? Again, what inducements are offered to the farmer to raise wheat when he can see the advantages in raising substitutes, sell them at any price and at any time, while the price of wheat is regulated, and he is unable even to sell it at all? The farmer who raises wheat is forced to pay twice as much for the substitutes as he is able to get for his wheat, which is really worth twice as much as the inferior substitutes. If these conditions continue, it looks to me as though all another year will go to raising those blessed substitutes. Of course, we are all loyal, but at the same time certain things can be carried too far, and I for one feel that this substitute business has gone far enough, and it is time now for the substitutes to get a price placed on them, and that to be in regard to their true value.

I am calling this letter to the attention of the Senate, and through the Senate to the attention of the Food Administration, for the reason that it is going to work just such a condition of affairs throughout the country as the gentleman writing this letter indicates.

It is going to result necessarily in the decrease of the production of wheat. It is going to result in a great hardship, especially upon that class of people who are not able to pay exorbitant prices, the working people and similar classes of people; and it is going to result in a very large income from profiteering, which is indirectly aided by this method of doing business. Such a chaotic condition of affairs ought not to be permitted to obtain if there is any possible way to prevent it; and if the Food Administration feels that there is not sufficient power in the law now to deal with this situation, I for one should be glad to have that fact made known, and during the long recess which we are now about to enjoy we might be able to find time enough to effectuate a change in the law.

I have here also a resolution, from a committee appointed by one of the county defense organizations, from Moscow, Idaho. It says:

In looking over the Food Administration bill (H. R. 4961) we find that the Food Administration has complete control only over wheat and wheat products. Its control over the price of wheat substitutes is only partial.

It can prevent hoarding, wastage, and speculation in these products; it can control the duration of storage and the amount of profits on storage; but it can not fix the price on wheat substitutes, either for producers or consumers.

We believe that the public is entitled to the same control over wheat substitutes as over wheat, for otherwise the excess profits which have been lost on wheat will be recovered on wheat substitutes.

In asking the public to buy breadstuffs on the 50-50 basis, the Food Administration is creating favorable conditions to make such a recovery possible.

That the wholesale dealers in wheat substitutes are now asking monopoly prices for their products is evident from the following observations:

In July, 1914, the price of wheat flour was 3.2 cents per pound. By June, 1917, it had risen to 8 cents per pound, but, because of the control by the Food Administration, it fell to 5.2 cents per pound in May, 1918.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, what was that statement about "because of the control by the Food Administration"?

Mr. BORAH (reading)—

In July, 1914, the price of wheat flour was 3.2 cents per pound. By June, 1917, it had risen to 8 cents per pound, but, because of the control by the Food Administration, it fell to 5.2 cents per pound in May, 1918.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the author of that communication had better correct his figures. Neither because of the control by the Food Administration nor, as a matter of fact, did the price go down. The flour that is being used now, every particle of it, is an adulterated flour, measured by the old standards; and it is as dear to-day, and in fact dearer to-day, than it ever was at this time of the year in the history of the world, when it is reduced to the original flour—that is, the flour we formerly had. Whatever reduction came at the time indicated, as can be clearly shown from the previous prices, came because the new wheat was coming on the market.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Idaho permit me to ask a question of the Senator from Missouri?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. BORAH. I do.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Do I understand the Senator from Missouri to say that there is no pure flour manufactured and sold now?

Mr. REED. Absolutely none. When I say "pure flour" I mean pure in the sense of the term formerly employed.

Mr. VARDAMAN. That is what I mean.

Mr. REED. Which was that the bran, the shorts, and the middlings had been taken out. You can not buy that kind of flour any more.

Mr. VARDAMAN. It has all been "Hooverized"?

Mr. REED. It all contains these grosser and coarser parts of the grain, which may be perfectly good for food, but they are not what we used to regard as the best kind of flour.

Mr. BORAH. It is probable that this letter is correct upon the face of it, but perhaps the writer did not take into consideration the adulteration of flour, as suggested by the Senator.

Mr. REED. The writer overlooked another thing. I suppose there is no exception to the fact that every year there has been a stiffening of prices at the end of the wheat year, which is approximately from the latter part of May to the middle of June, or even the 1st of July, the crop of wheat being largely exhausted. Then as soon as the new crop begins to come into the market—and that begins along in the month of June, but does not rise to any great height until about the month of July—that influx of new wheat immediately puts down the market price. That has been true every year, but the point I make is that with the single exception of the wheat that was cornered, with the single exception of the great international corner in wheat which was worked just before the creation of the Food Administration, there has been no real reduction in price.

That international corner was created by the various governments, both our allies and the neutrals, reaching into our markets and buying vast quantities of grain; and I have demonstrated time and again, in the statements that have been made in the RECORD, that one of the great causes for that increase in price was the purchases that were made by a committee controlled by Mr. Hoover; that they regularly bulled the market; they regularly bought and sold, and thus helped to create the very condition of which we have spoken. But, now, eliminating that great international corner, which was bigger than any corner that was ever created by Leiter or by Patten or any of those noted speculators, the price of grain and of flour is to-day higher than it ever was at any similar period in our history, and that is where the gentleman who writes the letter is in error.

Mr. BORAH. Of course, the principal point that the writer of the letter was seeking to establish was the point of comparison between wheat flour and substitutes.

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. Reading further from the resolution:

Corn meal in July, 1914, was 3.1 cents per pound. By June, 1917, it had risen to 5.5 cents per pound. In May, 1918, it is 7.2 cents per pound in 25-pound bags, and 8.5 cents per pound in 10-pound bags, which is the only size the grocers in Moscow carry.

Prior to June, 1917, the price of corn meal per pound was uniformly less than wheat flour. Following the introduction of the Food Administration the price of wheat flour dropped over 30 per cent, but that of corn meal increased 30 per cent.

This rise occurred in spite of the fact that the corn production in 1917 was five times as great as that of wheat, while the export trade was less than one-fifth as much.

The supply of corn in proportion to demand appears to be very much greater than wheat.

This also appears in the fact that on May 21, 1918, the wholesale price of corn was 35 per cent below that of wheat, but the price of corn meal was 35 per cent higher than wheat flour. This makes it evident that we are now paying monopoly prices on wheat substitutes.

Hoover, in his speech before the Senate Committee on Agriculture June 19, 1917, said that some one was taking $50,000,000 a month in excess profits from the American people by the sale of wheat flour. Some one is now taking $25,000,000 a month from the American public by the sale of wheat substitutes.

A great majority of the American people are now making their greatest sacrifice in order to win the war for democracy, but a small minority is taking this self-sacrifice and patriotism as an occasion for self-enrichment.

A minority think that this is an opportunity for mulcting the public out of its hard-earned money.

And then the resolution continues some pertinent comments upon that class of people which I have no doubt are in harmony with the views of the Senate, but are not relevant to the question of the comparison of prices with which we are now concerned. This resolution speaks for itself and portrays a condition calling for consideration. It should not be permitted longer to obtain. I feel the Food Administrator will see the necessity of taking hold and dealing with it at once.

Here is another letter, Mr. President, from Bishop H. R. Merrill, of Preston, Idaho, from which I desire to read a single paragraph or two. Bishop Merrill, who is a public-spirited man and a most active citizen of that part of the State, says:

At present the wheat situation seems very unsatisfactory. A producer of wheat is not allowed to eat all he wants of his own product; is forced to sell it at a stipulated price at inconvenient places and under unfavorable conditions; is forced, further, to buy substitutes at exorbitant prices, etc. At present flour is selling here for $4.90 a hundred. You may buy 50 pounds of flour and 50 pounds of substitutes at a time. The substitutes are corn flour, $10 a hundred; rice flour, $15 a hundred; oat flour, $10 a hundred; oat flakes, $8 a hundred; and barley flour, $8 a hundred. Why should the substitutes be so much higher?

Here is a case: Farmer Jones lives 25 miles from town—some farmers live farther than that. He has 500 bushels of wheat. He tries to dispose of it at the nearest siding, 8 miles away. No one is buying wheat except the mill in town. He hauls his wheat 25 miles. The miller screens it and grades it. He has full power. If the farmer registers a kick, the miller says, "That's Government orders," and so he pays for the wheat at his own grade price. The farmer wishes flour to take home; he is informed by the miller that he must buy it at the store. The store, I presume, gets about 20 or 25 cents a sack for handling it—that is what they got before the war. The farmer wishes flour. The merchant says, "You may have a 50-pound sack of flour and 50 pounds of substitute." The farmer has a large family. He pays $2.45 for flour and $5 for 50 pounds of substitute. Our women declare that it is impossible to use 50 per cent substitute in bread, consequently part of the substitute must be fed to the animals or must go for mush. He has to make this 50-mile trip every 10 days in order to keep in flour. All the time the Government is preaching conservation. One day out of 10 taken from his farm. He can't help but ask himself why these things are so.

Mr. President, I might read a great many other communications, and I have no doubt similar communications are coming to other Senators from different parts of the country. The point which I desire to emphasize and accentuate is that certainly there should be a control of the price of substitutes if we are to control the price of flour. As I have said here before, personally I have no objection whatever to the attempt to control the price of wheat until the experiment shall have satisfied us all as to results, provided we undertake to control those things which enter into the production of wheat and those things which we are compelled to buy as substitutes for wheat. Unless that course is adopted, we must necessarily have prevailing throughout the country such a condition as is indicated in these letters, greatly to the detriment of the producing classes and finally to the detriment of the consuming classes. I am satisfied myself, after examining the law, that the substitutes can be controlled, so far as prices are concerned, in the same way and just as effectively as the price of wheat.

Mr. CURTIS obtained the floor.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, before the Senator from Idaho takes his seat, if the Senator from Kansas will pardon me——

Mr. CURTIS. Certainly.

Mr. REED. I should like to ask the Senator from Idaho if he believes that the present control is authorized by any law?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, technically speaking, I do not. I do not believe it was intended to confer the authority which is not being exercised. But while I am bound to so express myself I do not desire to urge the want of power. The power is being exercised and I only wish to urge that it be exercised fairly and equitably.

Mr. REED. One question further——

Mr. BORAH. Just a word and then I will yield. Of course, what I rose to say and what I wanted to make plain was that the power, whatever it is, whether granted or assumed, must necessarily be the same with reference to substitutes as it is with reference to wheat.

Mr. REED. But the Senator has said that they could be controlled. I think he has almost gone to the extent of saying that if wheat is controlled, the price being forced down, the price of these other farm products should also be forced down. Would not the Senator have to add to that a further condition, that if you are going to control the price of all that the farmer produces—for that is what the proposition amounts to—then the price of what everybody else produces ought to be similarly controlled?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I think I would add that. I have stated that heretofore upon the floor of the Senate. I do not believe, myself, that price fixing is a feasible or practical proposition. I never have believed from the beginning that it could be made effective to accomplish the things which those who were advocating it desired so much to accomplish. I was of that opinion when the Food Administration bill passed and so expressed myself; and I am satisfied we will realize, as they have realized in European countries, that we will have to deal with the situation in some other way than that of price fixing; but I am satisfied of another proposition, that it produces additional chaos and additional calamity to undertake to fix the price of one article and not undertake to fix the price of all other staple articles which enter into the daily living of the people. I am not a believer in price fixing by law. I feel that if we would dispose of the speculator, the profiteer, and so forth, we would likely fare better under the law of demand and supply. But having entered upon the policy, I want it extended to these other articles.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas further yield? The Chair had recognized the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. BORAH. Excuse me.

Mr. REED. I am proceeding by the permission, I thought, of the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. CURTIS. I am perfectly willing to yield to the Senator from Missouri to ask any further question he desires of the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. REED. Then, the proper remedy is not to seize illegally the control of the other farm products, but is to relinquish the control of the one product of which they have seized control. That would be the proper remedy.

Mr. BORAH. Well, Mr. President, it is very apparent that we can not do that.

Mr. REED. That is, the Senator means, it is very apparent that we in the Senate can not accomplish that result.

Mr. BORAH. Exactly.

Mr. REED. Because these powers that have been taken over will be tenaciously clung to; but I want to offer this parting observation for the Senator to consider—the remark of the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE], sitting beside me—that it will not do to adopt the logic that because one pocket of the farmer has been picked all his other pockets should be likewise rifled.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I have received a number of letters similar to the letter read by the Senator from Idaho, and I would not take the time of the Senate to read any one of the letters received if it had not been for the fact that I have one here which makes the same complaint that is made by other writers; but in this letter the writer gives the actual cost of corn meal, and I think the Senate ought to be informed on the subject, so that they may know what profit is being made by those who sell corn meal:

> My neighbors complain that in the new food schedule the prices charged for substitutes are excessive. Flour is $2.75, or 5½ cents per pound, while the substitutes all are sold at 10 cents per pound—corn meal 10 cents, barley flour 10 cents, etc. Now, I buy corn and get it ground at a little mill at Hartford, Kans. I pay 15 cents per hundred for grinding. He keeps the bran and gives me 40 pounds of meal per bushel. This makes the meal cost me 3¾ cents per pound. A comparison with schedule prices will show that the poor people of this country are paying 6½ cents per pound more on this article of food than it costs, or nearly 200 per cent above cost.

The letter I have read was received a few days ago and since the schedule of prices has been sent to the dealers.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] did not call attention specifically to the authority which he stated he believed the Food Administration had to regulate the prices of substitute flour. Because of the extensive discussion of this matter and the universal complaint on the subject, I wish to occupy just a moment to call specific attention to just what authority the Food Administration has in that regard. Before doing so I want to say that, while I think the Food Administration has been slow in exercising its powers for the prevention of extortionate prices for corn meal, I believe that, on the whole, the Food Administration has rendered an inestimable service to the people of this country.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. POINDEXTER. In just a moment I will yield to the Senator. The debate that has just taken place shows, among other things, that even the critics of the Food Administration admit that but for the Food Administration the price of flour would have been higher than it is now; in other words, that the supply of wheat to the armies and the allies and the people of this country had been made more available by reason of the action of the Food Administration. The complaint is, as near as I can see, that the substitute flours are more expensive than wheat flour, for the reason that the Food Administration has regulated the price of wheat flour but has not regulated the prices of these substitute flours.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President——

Mr. POINDEXTER. Thereby admitting as a necessary deduction that the lower price of wheat flour is due to the Food Administration. I yield to the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. CURTIS. I ask the Senator if he thinks it is fair to the purchaser to require him to buy a lot of stuff he will not use and can not use? These letters indicate that that is being done.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I think, without going into the letters the Senator referred to or the specific details of these orders, the action of the Food Administration, which has resulted in the people of this country very largely through their voluntary action under the leadership of the Food Administration using on their tables substitutes for wheat flour, thereby releasing corresponding amounts of wheat flour, has been a valuable service to the country and consequently to the world in this crisis. I believe that the people who by these small denials and sacrifices on their family tables have accomplished a great result for the country in winning this war are entitled to know the extent to which their sacrifices have benefited the country. I do not think they know it. I do not think they understand and appreciate the total savings that these small sacrifices and self-denials have amounted to. I am informed——

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. POINDEXTER. Just a moment. I am informed that by reason of the voluntary limitations which the housekeepers of the country have placed upon their family use of wheat flour we have been enabled to supply our allies and our armies with 150,000,000 bushels of wheat which otherwise would not have been available.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator from Idaho first, as he first rose.

Mr. BORAH. I quite agree with the Senator in the proposition that if it had been effectuated, it has been good, to wit, that of inducing the American people to use substitutes in place of flour; but it does not seem to me that that meets the other proposition, that those substitutes which the people have been induced to use ought to be controlled in their price.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I agree with the Senator in that respect.

Mr. CURTIS. I will say, in this connection, the letter read by me indicates that a schedule of prices has been fixed for the substitutes; and the question I asked was, Is it fair to the people to require them to buy substitutes which they do not use at a higher price than they are paying for flour?

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. POINDEXTER. Let me answer the Senator from Kansas first. I answer him in the affirmative, so far as the principal matter he inquires of is concerned. I think it is wise, good public policy, and, furthermore, it is approved by public opinion, that as a war measure the Food Administration should take such reasonable steps as are necessary to require dealers to sell a quantity of substitute flour with the wheat flour which they sell.

Now, as to the regulation of the prices, I agree with the Senator from Kansas and the Senator from Idaho that they should be regulated just as the price of wheat flour has been regulated.

Mr. CURTIS. I agree with the Senator that millions of bushels of wheat have been saved by the housewives of the country by the use of substitutes and great good has resulted, but I contend it is not fair to make the people pay exorbitant prices for substitutes.

Mr. REED. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. Does not the Senator know they have been regulated, and that every pound of corn meal and of oatmeal and of other substitutes that has been sold by the grocery keepers of the United States has been sold at a price fixed by the Food Administration; that they fixed a schedule of prices for the grocers?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. POINDEXTER. Let me answer the question, since it is directed to a statement I made. I am informed—and I think I am reliably informed—that the Food Administration has not fixed any prices for these matters. I stated myself a moment ago in an interruption of the Senator from Idaho that the Food Administration, at least in some places, had published schedules of prices which they certified to be reasonable prices, and requested the people to inform them of higher charges that were made against them. Now, that has not been universal throughout the country, and there is no definite fixing of prices.

Mr. REED. I do not want my statement to be a particle too broad. This is what I mean to say. Without authority of law the Food Administration made a rule and notified the grocers of the United States, the retail dealers, that any variance from that rule would result in a forfeiture of their license, and of course that meant a destruction of their business and in many cases their bankruptcy. That rule prohibited them, although free American citizens, from selling to another free American citizen a single pound of flour unless he bought an equal quantity of some substitute. In a general way the Food Administration has assumed the authority to regulate the prices of all products sold by the grocers of the United States, and in many instances they have published schedules of prices.

Now, I affirm it to be my understanding of the fact that in these published schedules of prices they have recognized in substance and effect the prices for the substitutes which have been referred to here to-day upon the floor, so that, first, by creating the unnatural demand, forcing these substitutes upon the market, they raised the price; and, second, they have manipulated the licensing power so as to sanction the price and to compel the dealer to handle the goods.

Therefore, I say that whatever there is of excessive or wrong prices, such excessive prices as are evidenced by the statement the Senator from Kansas gave us, are directly chargeable to the Food Administration.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Does the Senator think they have done that for the deliberate purpose of running up these prices?

Mr. REED. I do not want to charge anybody with bad or wicked motives, but I say in answer to that question, when this legislation was proposed we were told that it was not the purpose to affect the primary producer, if I may use that term, it was intended to affect the middleman. We were told it was the middlemen with whom were included the speculators, who constituted the profiteering class, and it was these classes that it was proposed to regulate. Now, this is what happened.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I hope the Senator will not go at length into the subject.

Mr. REED. No; but the Senator asked me if I wanted to make any charge. This is what happened. I will be just as brief as I can.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Very well.

Mr. REED. The board of tradesmen who had been subject to much denunciation, wheat exchangemen and others were licensed, and then they were authorized to make a charge double—and in some instances four times—the charges they formerly laid upon the trade, so that their profits were doubled or quadrupled. The miller was licensed, and the reports are here from the Federal Trade Commission showing that the profits under regulation have been from two to three or four times what they were before. The packer was licensed, and the report of the Federal Trade Commission here is that the packer's profits under license have been five or six times greater than they ever were before; and now it appears from the statement of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] that the corn meal that costs three and a half cents a pound is boosted to 10 cents a pound when it goes through the grocer, and these grocers have all the time been licensed.

Now, taking it altogether, without charging anybody with any criminal purpose or intent, it looks to me as though the policy of the Food Administration had been to silence the protests of the capitalists and the middlemen who have large sums of money and to take advantage of the consumers and the producers.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I will not enter into a discussion of that issue, but content myself with saying that I do not myself entertain any such views of the purposes of the Food Administration. Most of the complaints that I know of in regard to the high prices for food substitutes were made before the recent action of the Food Administration in regard to those substitutes which the Senator from Missouri has just referred to. My experience was, as I said a while ago, I thought that the Food Administration was very slow and hesitant about exercising its proper authority in this matter in order to coordinate the prices of substitute flours with the price of wheat flour.

My information, however, is that quite recently they have acted in the matter. To what extent and to what particulars I have not inquired, but it is asserted only quite recently that it is quite a different attitude which the Food Administration takes now in regard to the matter. It is asserted now by them that they have instituted measures which they believe will have the effect desired. I hope it will. Whether it will or not it remains for the future to determine.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President——

Mr. POINDEXTER. That is an entirely different attitude from the one they previously took, which was that they had no authority to fix the prices. They have authority to fix the prices in a rather indirect way, but still it is quite express in the law. I yield to the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. CURTIS. I simply want to state to the Senator that the letter I read was received by me just a few days ago and was written, as I understand it, since the schedule of prices had been sent to the dealers.

Mr. BORAH. If I understand the Senator from Washington, he understands now that the Food Administration are willing to assume authority which they once thought doubtful.

Mr. POINDEXTER. That is my understanding. Section 5 of this act provides:

SEC. 5. That from time to time, whenever the President shall find it essential to license the importation, manufacture, storage, mining, or distribution of any necessaries, in order to carry into effect any of the purposes of this act, and shall publicly so announce, no person shall, after a date fixed in the announcement, engage in or carry on any such business specified in the announcement of importation, manufacture, storage, mining, or distribution of any necessaries as set forth in such announcement, unless he shall secure and hold a license issued pursuant to this section. The President is authorized to issue such licenses and to prescribe regulations for the issuance of licenses and requirements for systems of accounts and auditing of accounts to be kept by licensees, submission of reports by them, with or without oath or affirmation, and the entry and inspection by the President's duly authorized agents of the places of business of licensees. Whenever the President shall find that any storage charge, commission, profit, or practice of any licensee is unjust, or unreasonable, or discriminatory and unfair, or wasteful, and shall order such licensee, within a reasonable time fixed in the order, to discontinue the same, unless such order, which shall recite the facts found, is revoked or suspended, such licensee shall, within the time prescribed in the order, discontinue such unjust, unreasonable, discriminatory, and unfair storage charge, commission, profit, or practice. The President may, in lieu of any such unjust, unreasonable, discriminatory, and unfair storage charge, commission, profit, or practice, find what is a just, reasonable, nondiscriminatory, and fair storage charge, commission, profit, or practice.

Mr. President, there is absolute and complete authority to meet this situation. The only question is the discretion and the wisdom with which the authority is exercised. The President acts in the exercise of power conferred by this section through the Food Administration, and it is just the same as though instead of saying the President there is said the Food Administration.

The particular point which I want to call attention to is that it is not necessary even to issue licenses to accomplish the purpose which is intended to be accomplished by this act, because the power which is conferred upon them to issue licenses, and then, when the license has been issued to control the practice, and the profit, and the charge is sufficient to enable the Food Administration, which is supposed to be informed about these matters, to notify dealers and the people who are referred to in the letters which have been read to the Senate what a reasonable charge or profit is, and to notify them that if any unjust, unreasonable, or discriminatory charge or profit is continued by them that their stores will be closed up.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. REED. I know the Senator wishes to arrive at a correct conclusion about this matter, and I want to bring directly his attention to a distinction, while he is on his feet, in discussing this matter. It will take me a moment to state the preliminary part of it. I shall be very brief.

In the act of August 10, 1917, section 5, in the first part of the section, provides that—

Whenever the President shall find it essential to license the importation, manufacture, storage, mining, or distribution of any necessaries, etc.

Then, the President is authorized to issue licenses and prescribe regulations, and so forth. That applies, the Senator will notice, to the importation, the manufacture, the storage, or the mining or distribution of necessaries. Now, coming to the clause under question:

Whenever the President shall find that any storage charge—

That is, a charge for storage—commission, profit, or practice of any licensee is unjust or unreasonable or discriminatory and unfair or wasteful—

Then he may order the licensee to desist.

What I am calling the Senator's attention to is this: That does not go to the question of price at all, except to this extent, that the price can not be made unjust or unfair by adding an unfair charge or unfair profit. It does not go to the question of the original fixation of the price at all, but it does say that this retailer, this dealer, can not add an unfair charge for himself or engage in a discriminatory practice, and that far they can regulate. Therefore, under this situation, if the price of corn meal was 3½ cents a pound, using the illustration of the Senator from Kansas, they might say to the dealer, "It is unfair for you to charge 6½ cents profit."

I have no doubt of their power to do that under this act, provided the act is at all constitutional, a question that we are not now discussing. But that they can go back and regulate the price on the farm I utterly deny, and I utterly deny it because in the very last part of this section the farmer is expressly excluded. He is excluded first by the language I have just read, but the latter part of the section says:

Provided, That this section shall not apply to any farmer, gardener, cooperative association of farmers or gardeners, including live-stock farmers, or other persons with respect to the products of any farm, garden, or other land owned, leased, or cultivated by him.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, in answer to the Senator, I will say that it rather seems to me he wound up on a different question from what he started on. The first part of the section, I think, is applicable to storekeepers and retail dealers. They can be classed as distributors. Undoubtedly, they are distributors. If you can regulate their profits, you can regulate the prices they charge. Then, there is more general language than that in the bill, such as the word "practice," which is broad enough to cover an unfair or extortionate charge.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 3, line 7, after the word "furnishings," to strike out "seeds" and insert "seed wheat and beans," and in line 21, before the word "may," to strike out "seeds" and insert "seed wheat and beans," so as to read:

Second. For procuring, storing, and furnishing seed wheat and beans, as authorized by section 3 of the act, the appropriations for said purposes of $2,500,000 in section 8 of the act and $4,000,000 under the heading "Department of Agriculture" in the act approved March 28, 1918, entitled "An act making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, and prior fiscal years, on account of war expenses, and for other purposes," shall be available until the date when said act of August 10, 1917, shall cease to be in effect, and any moneys heretofore or hereafter received by the United States for furnishing such seed wheat and beans may be used as a revolving fund until said date.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 3, line 21, after the word "such," to strike out "seeds" and insert "seed wheat and beans," and in line 22, after the word "date," to insert:

Provided, That of said sum, $2,500,000 is hereby made available to be used by the Secretary of Agriculture, if in his judgment the public interest requires it, to purchase seed wheat and to supply the same on credit to farmers in the Great Plains area west of the ninety-eighth meridian. In no case shall any such advance to any one farmer exceed $300 and in all cases the repayment of such advances shall be guaranteed by a State or National bank or secured by bonds of the United States commonly known as liberty bonds or other obligations of the United States or in part by both such guaranty and security. And it shall be the duty of the Secretary of Agriculture to make collection for all such advances on or before November 1, 1919, and to report such collections in detail to the Congress on the first Monday in December thereafter: Provided, That the Secretary of Agriculture may use such obligations of the United States as collateral to borrow money for supplying seed to farmers for cash in pursuance of law. And the Secretary is further empowered to prescribe proper rules and regulations for carrying into effect the provisions hereof: Provided further, That when the Secretary purchases such seed from anyone other than the producer thereof, he shall not pay such dealer or intermediary a net profit of more than 10 cents per bushel above cost of such seed to said dealer or intermediary.

Mr. REED. I wish to ask the chairman of the committee why we should at this time be furnishing a fund of $2,500,000 as a revolving fund to buy seed wheat and beans?

Mr. GORE. Speaking for myself, personally, I can not give the Senator a sufficient answer.

Mr. REED. Then I am going to object to this amendment at this time.

Mr. CURTIS. May I ask what amendment it is?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the committee, but it will be passed over.

Mr. CURTIS. Is that the amendment beginning at the bottom of page 3 and continuing over to page 4?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is. It will go over.

Mr. KENYON. On page 3, I notice, there was passed over an amendment of the committee. I should like to ask the Senator from Oklahoma in regard to the item providing for live-stock production in the Great Plains region, $100,000.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is a part of the bill. It is not an amendment.

Mr. KENYON. There was a motion made to strike it out in committee, and I was under the impression that it carried.

Mr. GORE. I think the Senator is out of order at present. Perhaps he was not present when the Senate proceeded to consider the unobjected amendments reported by the committee.

Mr. KENYON. I was trying to get information about that item. I supposed it was an amendment.

Mr. GORE. No; that is in the bill as passed by the House.

Mr. KENYON. I thought we struck it out in the committee.

Mr. GORE. No; it was discussed, but upon final action it was not stricken out.

Mr. KENYON. I think perhaps that is true.

Mr. GORE. The subcommittee appointed reported back to the whole committee, and when the whole committee considered the subcommittee's report that action was not taken, although there were those in favor of striking it out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

TELEGRAPH AND TELEPHONE CONTROL.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, without recommendation, from the Committee on Interstate Commerce I report back the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 309) to authorize the President, in time of war, to supervise or take possession and assume control of any telegraph, telephone, marine cable, or radio system or systems, or any part thereof, and to operate the same in such manner as may be needful or desirable for the duration of the war, and to provide just compensation therefor.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I should like to ask the chairman of the committee reporting the joint resolution whether he had not originally announced his intention to hold hearings on this important measure?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. The chairman of the committee at the time was not present. It was suggested that action of that kind would be taken, but after due deliberation this afternoon a majority of the committee thought it should not be done, and so voted.

Mr. PENROSE. I should like further to inquire whether there were not a number of requests for hearings from persons interested?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. The chairman of the committee has received no requests.

Mr. PENROSE. I have been informed that there were such requests pending before the committee. I was so informed by a member of the committee, and I merely wanted to make the inquiry.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. The chairman of the committee has received none, and, so far as he is informed, the requests have not come in any official way.

Mr. PENROSE. If the inquiry is proper, I should like to be assured by the Senator that a quorum of the committee was present.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. A quorum of the committee according to the rule of the committee was present.

Mr. PENROSE. What are the rules of the committee as to a quorum?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. That a certain number shall constitute a quorum, and that absent Senators may request to be counted as a quorum.

Mr. PENROSE. That is the standing rule of the committee?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. It is the standing rule of the committee. Enough were present to make an ordinary working quorum, and the request to be counted as a quorum made it absolute.

Mr. PENROSE. The Senator from South Carolina would hardly term this the ordinary work of the committee?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I do not know whether the Senator would call it ordinary or extraordinary or what kind of terminology he would use, but it is the work of the committee.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from South Carolina if it was not understood when the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] left the city that there were to be hearings had upon this joint resolution?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Yes; and it was also the understanding of the chairman of the committee when the Senator from Iowa left the city that we should have a recess.

Mr. SMOOT. Did the committee hear, or did any member of the committee hear, from the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I do not know that they did. The committee took the action they did with full knowledge of the facts, which are now brought out.

Mr. SMOOT. Was there a single Member of the minority party present at the committee meeting?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Yes; I think there were a number of Members present.

Mr. PENROSE. My understanding is that only one Member of the minority party was present.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Perhaps that is so.

Mr. PENROSE. I want to add, if the Senator from Utah will permit me, that I know Senators have left Washington under what they thought was an assurance that hearings would be held, coming from majority members and from the chairman of the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I think the last statement of the Senator from Pennsylvania needs correction. The chairman of the committee was not here, but the acting chairman, the ranking member of the committee, was present.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, this is rather an unheard of action on the part of the committee. I can not understand it. I can not see what advantage is going to be gained by any such action. It does seem to me that the least the committee could have done would have been to have telegraphed to members of the committee that they were going to hold a meeting within a day or two upon the joint resolution, and then, if those members did not return to Washington, they could have sent whatever answer they desired to members of the committee as to how they stood or what action they desired to have taken.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I desire to state, in justice to the committee, that a minority member of the committee called up the chairman of the committee at his home over the long-distance telephone, informed him of the conditions, and asked when the chairman would be present. He was informed that the chairman would come by the very next train that could bring him. He then said, "I will not leave the city, and I authorize him to call a meeting to-day at 2 o'clock, and to so notify the members," which was done.

Mr. SMOOT. That may have been one Member of the minority; but I should not care whether it was a minority Member or a majority Member.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. The point was this, if the Senator will allow me: Thinking that perhaps we were to take a recess and that there would be some time to devote to the matter, there was some understanding arrived at as to hearings—I do not know what it was—but after the possibility of a recess had disappeared, then the question arose as to whether the consideration of the measure should not be proceeded with immediately. I was so informed by my friend. He had made arrangements to go away, but when the recess was defeated he stayed. I was not in the city, and asked him to notify the members of the committee, which was done. That was certainly a very few hours after the action by Congress in refusing to adjourn until August 12.

I desire to state, Mr. President, that nobody has tried to take snap judgment on anybody else.

Mr. PENROSE. Oh, no!

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. It is simply a question which the Senate has got to decide in the last analysis, and we sent it back here for the determination of the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, it seems to me a rather strange condition of affairs.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. Just a moment. Last Saturday there was not a Senator, in my opinion, who did not understand that this joint resolution was of such vital importance that the committee were to hold hearings upon it; that it affected so many people and was of such broad scope that nothing short of a hearing of some sort would justify the reporting of the measure to this body. That was so thoroughly understood that it was stated upon the floor of the Senate that consideration was not given to the joint resolution in the other House, because they expected the Senate to investigate the matter and decide whether or not the joint resolution should be passed. Now, without a change, without a notice, the joint resolution is reported to the Senate with no recommendations whatever. I must admit, Mr. President, that I can not understand it.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, unless the acting chairman of the committee desires to be heard in answer to what has been said I desire to call for the regular order.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] has said what I thought, perhaps, he had misunderstood, that the committee reported the joint resolution without recommendation. That was done because the joint resolution speaks for itself. It was, in the opinion of the committee, so worded that hearings, either pro or con, from those who were to execute and administer the law as well as those whom it might affect, were not necessary; it was in such a condition that the Senate would have to decide whether the joint resolution should be passed or should not be passed. It was the opinion of the majority of the committee that hearings would not influence the Senate one way or the other, because of the nature of the joint resolution. On that ground we thought, perhaps, without recommendation, we had better lay it before the Senate and let the Senate take such action as in their opinion was justifiable.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I agree with the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT]. Here is a joint resolution which proposes to take over not only the big telegraph companies—that is less important, for they are able to take care of themselves—but to take over more than 8,000 small companies all over this country, the independent lines, with more than $200,000,000 of property, and to inaugurate a system of Government operation of the telegraph, telephone, and cable lines of this country; and yet the Senate committee does not give any consideration whatever as to the reasons for such action.

For my part, if there is any military necessity or any reasonable ground to infer that there may be a military necessity for such action, I am ready to vote this minute not only to take over the cable lines, telegraph lines, and the telephone lines, but to take over any public utilities in the country in order to help win the war; but nobody has yet given me any reason for such action. I am not saying that I am opposed to it.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. KELLOGG. I yield.

Mr. KENYON. The Senator from Minnesota is a member of the committee, and I should like to ask him how much time the committee gave to the actual consideration of this joint resolution?

Mr. KELLOGG. Well, the committee met a little after 2 o'clock this afternoon, and the report of the joint resolution was made a few moments ago. The clock shows the time.

Mr. REED. But the RECORD does not.

Mr. KELLOGG. Well, the joint resolution was considered a little over an hour.

Mr. President, I am not saying that I am not in favor of taking over the telegraph and cable lines, and perhaps also the telephone lines, if there is any military necessity for doing so, if the Government could operate them better than the private companies can. I am willing to vote for it, but I do not believe, after these companies have been in the hands of private owners for the year and three months during which the war has been going on, and no suggestion has been made that the Government should take them over, that a military necessity for doing so has arisen since last Saturday or since last week.

I may be mistaken; I am not going to prejudge the case; I do not know, and I have been unable to find out; but I should like to have some officials of the Government tell me why it should be done. If they say there are reasons that can not be disclosed publicly I shall be satisfied with that statement. I am going to have confidence in the Commander in Chief who is carrying on this war. I have been backing him, and am going to back him, in everything that is necessary; but I do think that we ought to consider the joint resolution in committee and hear some testimony or make some investigation before we pass upon it.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Minnesota a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. KELLOGG. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. REED. I want to ask the Senator whether the question as to the control and management of these properties after they are taken over was in any way discussed by the committee?

Mr. KELLOGG. I do not know whether it is proper to disclose the conversations before the committee; I hardly think it is. I am a new man at the business The committee was in executive session.

Mr. REED. Well, I do not, of course, want to pry into any of the secrets of the committee, but I take it that, this being a public matter, the mere question as to whether or not the committee in the hour and 10 minutes it was in session discussed the question at all of the kind of organization that ought to be created to control these properties or not. It seems to me that is a proper question.

Mr. KELLOGG. I think the question is a fair question, but I should prefer that the chairman of the committee should answer it.

Mr. REED. One reason I asked the question is that I understand there has been introduced by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] a bill having to do with the very important question of the control of these properties. I have not had an opportunity to examine the bill; but, if I do understand the general object the Senator from Illinois is aiming at, it is that there shall be created some sort of organization under the Government which will take control of these public utilities and manage them, not by piecemeal, but as a whole. I understand that it proposes, if the telegraphs and telephones are to be taken over, that as they are intimately associated and connected with the railroads, and as both will be associated to a greater or less extent with the boat lines and the steamship lines, some plan ought to be developed for a bringing of all of these utilities under one common control.

Now, I am not prepared to commit myself to that idea one way or the other; but as we are dealing with questions that involve hundreds of millions of dollars—and, I apprehend, first and last and in its broader aspect, thousands of millions of dollars—and as these questions intimately concern the business of every citizen and almost the rights of every citizen, I had hoped that this committee would give some attention to these subjects.

I do not agree with the chairman of the committee, who says that this resolution is of such character that everything lies upon its face. Of course, the ultimate object of the resolution is perfectly plain. It proposes to take these properties. But upon what terms are we to take them? Is the method of ascertainment of value which is named in the joint resolution a correct method, and if it is not a correct method can a correct method be devised? If that question is at issue, where should it be settled—upon the floor of the Senate, or should it be considered in the committee?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, in regard to the question of compensation, the committee was of the opinion that the clause in the joint resolution, which is one that has been written into several acts of legislation, has been the most satisfactory of any that have been proposed, and certainly more satisfactory than the one which, after much labor, we wrote into the railroad law. It is this:

That just compensation shall be made for such supervision, possession, control, or operation, to be determined by the President; and if the amount thereof, so determined by the President, is unsatisfactory to the person entitled to receive the same, such person shall be paid 75 per cent of the amount so determined by the President and shall be entitled to sue the United States to recover such further sum as, added to said 75 per cent, will make up such amount as will be just compensation therefor.

In other words, in place of having a bargaining plan they are remitted to the courts.

Mr. REED. Ah, but, Mr. President, the Senator has not stated the whole question, as I think. No one in the Chamber is more unwilling to reflect in any way upon the judgment of the President of the United States than myself; but notice the language of this joint resolution. It provides that if the company which owns the telegraph or the telephone line is dissatisfied with the price the President may have fixed, it may go to the courts and in the meantime receive 75 per cent. But is it a certainty that the President might not offer a price greater than should be offered? I say this without the slightest reflection upon the President, for we know that the President can not appraise the properties; he individually can not determine their value. If he should undertake to do that, the war would be over before he could get through with one-hundredth part of the work.

He must act through agents. Who will the agent be? Will it be the Postmaster General? Will it be the Department of Justice? Will it be, as has been suggested, Mr. Lewis? Or will it be some of the "dollar-a-day men"? I say that the question of the proper tribunal in which to determine these values is vital; it is not a trifling question. Anybody who so believes will have occasion to revise his opinion.

I know enough about the telephone values of this country to understand that one of the most difficult problems that any court will ever undertake to solve will be the question of the proper valuation of telephone properties. It would take me hours to detail the ramifications of the telephone organization of this country, a thing I happen to know a good deal about, because I was compelled through some litigation to expend a very considerable amount of time in advising myself with reference to it. When it is undertaken to get down to the question of what they are entitled to, it will require the best court in this country and the finest corps of lawyers that can be organized and all the experts that can be assembled, in my opinion not less than a year's time, to fix anything like a proper valuation. Any value that the President, with all his wisdom and all his patriotism and all his sagacity, would put on these properties at the present time would, in the very nature of things, be the wildest kind of a guess.

I am going to ask the attention of the Senate for a moment until I illustrate just one of the intricacies. I know of a telephone property which belongs to the Bell Co. It is a subsidiary company. It was claimed, and by its books it was able to show, that its investment in the property, as the figures now run in my mind, was in excess of $2,500,000. An expert accountant was put upon its books and demonstrated that the original investment of that company was about $38,000, and he demonstrated it from a set of books that had been hidden away, and disclosed that there had been plenty of perjury committed in endeavoring to conceal the real facts.

The system of organization in itself is one that naturally calls for the closest kind of an investigation if any accurate result is to be obtained. Roughly speaking, the parent Bell Telephone Co. was organized with a certain amount of capital stock and bonds. It owned the Bell patents, and it, of course, controlled the territory of the United States. It then proceeded to organize subsidiary companies in this wise: A company would be organized, let me say, in Philadelphia; 49 per cent of the stock would be taken by local people and paid for and 51 per cent would be taken by the Bell Co. in consideration of its privileges, its patents, and its franchises.

Out of the proceeds from the 49 per cent the plant would be built, and the 51 per cent of stock, being the controlling interest, would go into the treasury of the parent company. That is a sufficient complication. But, behold, this Philadelphia company—and I am not saying it is true of that particular company, but I am using it as an illustration of a general situation—would have a territory assigned to it in which it would organize companies on the same basis as the parent Bell company had organized the Philadelphia company; that is to say, the Philadelphia company would organize companies in various cities and towns within a certain territory, which companies would turn over 51 per cent of their capital stock to the Philadelphia company, and out of the 49 per cent, which was sold to the local people, the plant would be built. So that this entire institution, as it existed a few years ago and as it spread itself over the United States, was organized in the manner I have spoken of. The subsidiary companies, being controlled by the parent company, were required to pay large royalties to the parent company. In the case that I have in mind it was proven beyond peradventure that they were paying royalties of almost prohibitive size upon instruments the patents on which had expired years ago, the royalty in some cases for the use of an instrument for a single year amounting to more than the instrument could be bought for in the open market.

Mr. President, when we propose to take over a thing of that kind and to pay for it at any price which is to be fixed, except at the end of a careful investigation, we are proposing to play fast and loose with the money of the people of the United States.

If I may be pardoned, I will call attention to another fact which I think is of importance and which does not lie upon the face of this joint resolution, and that is the question of the control and management of these properties. Who is to control them? Who is to manage them? Surely that is a great question. I have been a public-ownership man, so far as the telegraph and telephone companies are concerned, nearly all of my life, and I am now at this moment, but I have always believed that before we take over these great utilities a plan ought to be carefully worked out which would result, as nearly as possible, in the employment of sound business methods in their management. We can not disregard business methods in the management of a public utility unless the burden at once falls upon the people of the country; every bit of mismanagement there may be will be paid for by the telephone users of the United States, and they embrace practically the entire population of the United States. So there ought to be a sound system of management provided for. When any committee will put a question of that kind aside as unworthy of consideration and in 50 or 60 or 70 minutes' time report back a measure of this importance, it seems to me that there is only one thing to do, and that is to refer the question to a committee that will act.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, would the Senator mind being interrupted for a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. PENROSE. I do not know whether the Senator fully realizes the iniquity of this proceeding. It is utterly subversive of every principle of a deliberative assembly. The minority Members of this body might just as well withdraw and cease their legislative activities as long as this régime is in existence. When the American people wake up to the way things are being done, there will be an avalanche of protest, disapproval, and repudiation.

Does the Senator from Missouri, who believes in Government ownership, believe that when the Senator from South Carolina, the chairman of the committee, fathered a resolution as late as last Saturday afternoon providing for hearings——

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I beg the Senator's pardon. The Senator from South Carolina was not here then. I have said that twice.

Mr. PENROSE. Then his committee.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Well, that is a different proposition.

Mr. PENROSE. Well, it is slightly different, but when members of the committee and other Senators have left Washington upon the assurance that hearings would be held, and other Senators, like myself, have written scores of letters to inquirers assuring them that hearings would be held, and the committee, Mr. President, or the chairman of the committee calls a meeting without giving notice to his own members, he gathers a little handful on a verbal notice at 2 o'clock this afternoon and passes upon one of the most momentous measures that have appeared in the American Congress during the present session, can he defend it? He sits silent in his seat, and he knows he can not defend it.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, I just want to make this remark, and perhaps this will be all that I shall have to say:

The joint resolution as it now appears says that for the war emergency, for the prosecution of the war, if the President of the United States deems it necessary to take over the telegraphs and telephones, he is enabled by this joint resolution to do it. The question of compensation is provided for just as in other measures. If he, the head of the military forces of this country, with the stupendous task that is upon him, asks to have access to the means of communication for the prosecution of this war, and to use his discretion as to what part or any or all of it is needed for that purpose, I know, and the Senator from Pennsylvania knows, that it is going to be given to him. It ought to be given to him. It was only a question of knowing what were the private rights involved, which the committee thought were amply taken care of in the measure.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, let it be given to him if good reason is shown for it; but let it be given to him in an orderly and constitutional way, under the light of reason and illuminated by deliberation, and not by arbitrary methods of this kind at the first rumblings heard from the White House.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I did not mean to yield. I want to complete my statement, because as it now stands it does not fully express my views.

I started to say that I had been for many years a public-ownership man as to telephones and telegraphs. At the same time I have believed that a plan ought to be worked out by which we would be assured that business principles would be employed in the management of these great properties, and that they should be, as far as possible, taken out of politics. They should not become the instrument in the hands of somebody for the purpose of employing them for political reasons. I believe both those things can be done, and I had hoped that this committee would give attention to questions of that kind. It is one thing to take over these properties under proper auspices and protection and regulation and control and quite a different thing simply to take them over and turn them into the hands of somebody who may employ them for more purposes than were originally intended.

There is another question involved upon which we have absolutely no advice, and which the committee ought to have given us. The statement is made that this is a war measure. Mr. President, if it be shown that it is necessary to the proper prosecution of the war that these properties should be taken over, there is not a man in the Congress of the United States but will grant, without any hesitation, the power to do it. But, sir, does such a necessity exist?

The answer will be that the bill is not imperative; it is left to the judgment of the President. Again, without the slightest thought of reflecting upon the judgment of the President, in a question of this kind is not the Congress entitled to be advised? Is it not entitled to some information? Is it not in duty bound to exercise some degree of judgment and of discretion and of opinion? Or is it to utterly and incontinently abandon its duties?

I say upon this subject, as I have said upon other occasions, that you may refuse to perform your duty, but you can not transfer it. That duty which the Constitution reposes in the Congress, that obligation which the people placed upon you when they sent you here to represent them, is a duty that you can not transfer. You may abdicate, you may fail to perform a duty, but you can not transfer it.

Again, I had hoped that the committee would have told us whether it was necessary to take all of these properties or only part thereof. I had hoped that this joint resolution would be so drawn when it came back from the committee that we would not be met as we were with the railroad problem, when the Government first took over all of the railroads, and then, at the moment that Congress was passing a bill to require that all that had been taken over should be kept, at that very moment, with great haste, the department in control of the railroads was letting go some seventeen hundred of them. In other words, the department was trying to defeat the purpose of Congress by letting go of the roads before the legislation could be enacted. I do not want to say a harsh thing, but I regard that sort of thing as almost disgraceful. It is quite a different proposition than it would have been if they had waited until Congress had acted and then protested to Congress or if they had protested before action, before any action, and sought to convince that the contemplated action was unwise; but we witnessed the spectacle of a race to defeat a congressional bill by doing something before Congress had time to act. That was a very remarkable performance.

I had hoped that when we passed this joint resolution we might determine whether only the long-distance telephones were to be taken charge of, whether we were going beyond the long-distance telephones and were to take charge of plants in the large cities, or whether we would take over the entire telephone and telegraph systems of the country. That may not be worth a half hour's consideration by the committee, but I think it is, and I think it is yet worthy of consideration by some committee that will consider it; and I have not so poor an opinion of Congress as to believe that there is not some man in this body, neither have I so poor an opinion of these committees as to believe that there is not some member of one of them, who might shed some light upon this question, who might be of some assistance in solving these great problems.

So, Mr. President, I regret this action. It may be that the only place of honor in the United States is in the coat-tail brigade, and that the stamp of a statesman is to be the zero mark; that the Congressman and the members of committees are to try to do no more than to occupy that mathematical position which the cipher has, having a value only as it bears relation to an integer; but I do not believe that is true. I never have heard a bill debated upon the floor of Congress for any length of time, or debated in a committee for any length of time, when some good has not come from it; and the first place for consideration of the questions such as are presented by this bill is in committee.

Nobody need get stampeded now. You need not get frightened about strikes, for I say to you that there is enough law on the statute books to-day so that any employee of any telephone or telegraph company who starts a strike and interferes with the conduct of this war and the public business will find himself in a very serious situation. There is a lot of legislation of that character. Besides, we are not going to have any strike for another reason, viz, the employees of the telegraph companies in this country are too patriotic to tie up the lines of communication at a time like this. I am just as certain of it as I am certain that our people are going to respond to the calls of the Government in this war. I believe that if you will count them man for man the telegraphers will be found to be as willing to put on a uniform and fight for their country as the members of any other business; and if that is true I am very certain that in a time like this they will not tie up the business of the country. In addition to these reasons we have the assurance of the press that the telegraphers have determined that there shall be no strike. That is another reason, and a higher and a better reason than the one I first gave, why we need not fear a strike.

There is another reason still why we need not fear a strike. We settled the law a few months ago that Congress had the right to regulate the wages of railroad men because they were engaged in interstate commerce, and under that same principle of law I have not the slightest doubt that we could, if it were necessary, regulate the wages of the men engaged in operating the telegraph and telephone systems. I have not the slightest doubt of it; so there is no danger from a strike. If there were danger, we could meet it in many other ways.

Therefore why this indecent haste? Why not wait until we can act wisely? I am not asking for 30 days of delay. I am not asking even for 30 hours of delay, but I am asking that a committee shall take such time as ought to be taken in order to thoroughly sift and understand this kind of legislation, and they ought to come here and be able to tell Congress a few facts. I undertake to say that there is not a man on the committee who can tell us how many telephone companies there are in the United States. If there is such a man, I should like to have him rise to his feet and tell me.

I undertake to say that they can not tell us how many employees there are on the telephones of the United States, nor how many of them are male and how many of them are female. I undertake to say that the committee can not report back here the number of employees there are in the telegraphs of the United States unless they go and look up the matter; that they can not tell us the number of poles or the number of miles of wire; that they can not come within a hundred million dollars of the amount of money that is invested. The committee, although it is composed of splendid gentlemen, has not been specializing upon this line of work. A few days' time and they could bring all these facts to Congress. If they do not bring them to Congress, then each of us must go out for himself and hunt up the facts as an original proposition. The business of the committee is to get the facts, bring them here, and give us the reasons for this report.

Mr. President, I have said all that I care to say, and at much greater length than I intended. I am not standing here to bar any action that is necessary to the conduct of this war; but I do want to know what I am doing, and when I act I want to act properly.

Mr. PENROSE obtained the floor.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I should like very much to proceed with the unfinished business.

Mr. PENROSE. I am speaking on the unfinished business as it bears on the Government ownership of telegraph and telephone companies.

Mr. GORE. Oh! I beg the Senator's pardon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that unanimous consent was asked that this report be presented.

Mr. PENROSE. I desire to object to the report being presented at this time, and in connection with the unfinished business I desire to make a few remarks.

Mr. President, I do not think in the history of any legislative body from here to Russia has a more high-handed proceeding been perpetrated than that which we have witnessed this afternoon. I speak coolly and advisedly, although my indignation runs high. We are supposed to be in a battle for liberty and to be engaged in a tremendous conflict to bring about the downfall of autocracy, and yet here in the Senate of the United States every principle of orderly constitutional procedure and of liberty has been outraged and violated.

Let us look at what has been done.

Saturday evening a resolution was solemnly passed by the Committee on Interstate Commerce of the Senate providing for hearings upon the joint resolution for Government control during the period of the war of the telegraph and telephone lines of the country. No opposition was encountered to the proposition. On the contrary, it seemed to have the hearty indorsement of the chairman and all the members of the committee. Senators were informed that the hearings would take place, even if they lasted several weeks. Many of them have left Washington upon that information. We sat here until nearly 11 o'clock on Saturday evening; and at 2 o'clock to-day, without any official notice, the chairman of the committee merely picking up by verbal communication such handful of members as were accessible and available, a meeting of the committee was held.

At the time of that meeting there were in Washington only two members of the minority. The senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] was absent, having been fully and solemnly assured by official action of the committee that the hearings should be held. The junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] was absent on account of sickness in his family. The senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] was absent on account of illness in his family. The junior Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER], I am informed, appeared in the committee room for a moment and had to return to the floor, as he was engaged in addressing this body, and was unable to attend this meeting, called on such short notice by the Committee on Interstate Commerce. The junior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN] was likewise absent, as was the junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON], leaving the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] as the only minority member, except one, present in Washington, and the only minority member present at the meeting of the committee. There was no notice, even by telegram, to the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] that this resolution, so solemnly passed, was about to be repudiated and a snap meeting of the committee called.

I will read the resolution:

It is moved that it is the sense of the Interstate Commerce Committee of the Senate that it proceed without delay to enter upon a hearing upon House joint resolution 309, and that the chairman of the committee be requested to make the necessary arrangements for the attendance of interested parties and that a report upon the resolution be made as soon as possible.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, that was transmitted to me by wire, and immediately there followed it another to this effect—I am just giving the substance of it:

Since wiring you the recess has fallen through, and it is the sense of the committee that you come to Washington at once and proceed with the hearing with the committee.

Mr. PENROSE. Yes. The Senator corroborates and makes stronger my statement.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. It said: "Come and proceed at once." That was at a time when the recess was in contemplation and they were going to go on and take up such leisurely time as they saw fit. But to-day, when the committee met, some of those that were present—others can speak for themselves—after having considered the bill and the facts in the case one of them at least has certainly changed his mind, as some other members of the committee must have done, because a majority to-day took action on this matter, as a majority did the day before.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I should like to ask the chairman of the committee, since he has seen fit to rise, whether this resolution was ever reconsidered and repealed in the committee this afternoon?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. It was not.

Mr. PENROSE. No; so it is still in force.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. It was by the same body that the first resolution was passed that that one was passed.

Mr. PENROSE. Can the Senator inform me how many of the members of the committee were actually present?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. There were actually present seven members of the committee, and there were two others present by proxy. The committee proceeded, as it has done before, to act by its rules and regulations; and after sufficient consideration, in the majority opinion, to report the bill, we did report it. As a matter of course, if it does not meet with the approval of the Senator from Pennsylvania, he is at perfect liberty to express himself; but the Senate committee were perfectly honest in the action they took, and, as far as the minority members are concerned, I do not think any party aspect was given it at all. Certainly none was considered in the mind of the chairman, and I do not think any was considered in the mind of any member of the committee.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, there are a great many honest men who have a serious struggle against adverse appearances in this world.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. There is nobody who knows that better than the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. PENROSE. Yes.

Mr. POMERENE. I do not wish to ask a question. I was going to make a brief statement.

Mr. PENROSE. If I do not lose the floor, I shall be very glad to hear the Senator's statement. I only intended to take a few minutes longer; but I will yield.

Mr. POMERENE. I will wait until the Senator has concluded.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. PENROSE. For an inquiry.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I will ask the Senator if we did not pass a resolution in the Senate providing that no committee could submit a report unless a majority of the committee was present to agree upon the report? The rule, I think, provides that the committee shall decide what constitutes a quorum, and that may be less than a majority of the committee; but there is a provision that no bill can be reported unless——

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I have before me the rule to which the Senator from Washington refers.

Mr. JONES of Washington. It is some time since I have examined it.

Mr. POMERENE. I will ask the Secretary to read it for the information of the Senate.

Mr. PENROSE. Yes; let the Secretary read it.

Mr. POMERENE. It is on page 28, section 3 of Rule XXV.

The SECRETARY. Paragraph 3 of Rule XXV, at the top of page 28 of the standing rules of the Senate, is as follows:

> That the several standing committees of the Senate having a membership of more than three Senators are hereby respectively authorized to fix, each for itself, the number of its members who shall constitute a quorum thereof for the transaction of such business as may be considered by said committee; but in no case shall a committee acting under authority of this resolution fix as a quorum thereof any number less than one-third of its entire membership, nor shall any report be made to the Senate that is not authorized by the concurrence of more than one-half of a majority of such entire membership.

Mr. PENROSE. The Senator from Washington is entirely right, Mr. President; and I am glad that he has had the rule read to the Senate.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. PENROSE. Yes.

Mr. KENYON. I should like to inquire the date of the resolution to which the Senator has referred.

Mr. PENROSE. This resolution, as I understand, was agreed to late on Saturday.

Mr. KENYON. I know that my colleague [Mr. CUMMINS] left the city thoroughly understanding that there were to be hearings. He has given great attention to this subject, and would not have left otherwise.

Mr. PENROSE. He would not have left otherwise; he so informed me.

Mr. KENYON. He did not leave until after the resolution was adopted.

Mr. PENROSE. He did not leave until after it was adopted and he had been assured that there would be hearings, and everyone was full of zeal for hearings until the face of nature changed this afternoon and the docile committee makes this report.

Let us look at these various steps, Mr. President.

First, this resolution which I have read passes with enthusiasm and zeal, with the light of battle in everyone's eye, and the Senate believing hearings would be held. The senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], a member of the committee, and other members leave Washington on that official assurance. Then a meeting of the committee is called on practically five minutes' notice. I do not think the chairman of the committee will contend that there was any notice of the meeting, except of a nominal character. A corporal's guard gathered together of those that were within the view of the chairman, or whoever superintended the calling of the meeting. There are 17 members of the Committee on Interstate Commerce, Mr. President; and of that number all of the minority were absent from Washington, largely on the assurance of this resolution that no hasty action would be taken, except, as I have said, the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] and the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG]. The Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER], I am informed, was only in the committee room for a moment, he being engaged in addressing the Senate, so that he had to return to the floor. Only one of the minority therefore was present.

I am informed that the chairman [Mr. SMITH of South Carolina] was present, the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE], the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS], the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY], the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS], and the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD]. All the other members of the majority were absent. In the committee there were 4 votes for the proposition and 3 votes against it, as nearly as my recollection serves me. Therefore, this joint resolution is reported to the Senate by a minority of the committee by the narrow margin of 1 vote, and in defiance of the rule of the Senate which requires that a majority of a committee shall concur in a report. Therefore, I repeat, Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator object to the reception of the report because a majority of the majority has not concurred in it?

Mr. PENROSE. Yes; and I object on general principles, so as not to interfere with or delay the prompt consideration of the agricultural bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the Senator makes that as a point of order, the Chair is disposed to sustain it.

Mr. PENROSE. Then I make the point of order.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Was not the joint resolution reported?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It has been reported and has been held here on the table. It has not been received. It has not gone to the calendar; and if a point of order is made——

Mr. PENROSE. I make the point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It must be rejected.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. On what grounds?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On the ground that the third paragraph of Rule XXV requires the majority of a majority of a committee to report a bill.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I merely want to state that if we are to invoke that rule I shall be compelled to invoke it on the present Agricultural bill.

Mr. PENROSE. I will help the Senator.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. And I shall invoke it on other bills as well. I submit to the Chair, notwithstanding that rule, the custom of the standing committees, as will be borne out by every chairman, is to have bills reported out habitually by the agreed-upon working quorum of the committee, and to invoke such a rule now in this emergency is overturning a custom that has become a rule by usage.

Mr. PENROSE. To what emergency does the Senator refer?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Just the mere fact of the emergency that seems to be on some to have hearings. I will simply state circumstances, not emergency.

Mr. PENROSE. I am glad the Senator did not use that rather threadbare term "emergency" to get through questionable legislation. We have heard a great deal about it.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I could use the word "emergency," for there is an emergency on us—a very much recognized emergency, that means life or death now.

Mr. PENROSE. Where is the slaughter committed to which the Senator refers?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. The slaughter is committed on the battle fields of France.

Mr. PENROSE. This bill has no present bearing on it.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. It might have. I am not going to take the chances that it shall not have.

Mr. PENROSE. The Senator has been awakened by a fire alarm. I ask for the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Before the Chair rules, let me ask what information has the Chair as to who were present? What formal information has the Chair?

Mr. PENROSE. The chairman of the committee.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not understand that the chairman of the committee stated who were present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair asks if there was a point of order raised?

Mr. PENROSE. I raised it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. As stated, unless it is shown that a majority of a majority of the committee has concurred in this report, it must be rejected under Rule XXV.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I call the attention of the Chair to the fact that Rule VII provides that no Member shall absent himself from this Chamber without the consent of the Senate. I should like to know why that rule is not invoked. The Members were not here. The chairman of the committee notified every one officially who was here. How could he notify those who were not here, when the rule requires that they shall not absent themselves without the consent of the Senate? Therefore I say now constructively they were present.

Mr. PENROSE. Not at all.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Or else the Senate itself should be blamed, and not the committee or the chairman, for those who were not present.

Mr. PENROSE. They were absent when under this resolution they were assured that hearings were to be given.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. PENROSE. If I can do so without losing the floor.

Mr. SWANSON. As to whether the committee ought or ought not to have reported, that is another question. On the point of order it seems to me clear from the statement of the chairman of the committee that the report is in order. I understand there were a majority of members present and by proxy.

Mr. PENROSE. The proxy does not count.

Mr. SWANSON. Exclude those by proxy. I understand the committee is composed of 17 members. A majority of the membership is 9. Section 3 of Rule XXV provides that by the concurrence of more than one-half of the majority a report may be made, and a majority is 5. I understand 6 concurred in this report.

Mr. PENROSE. No; there were absentees.

Mr. SWANSON. Nine is a majority of the committee. Then it says one-half of the majority must concur in the report. One-half of 9 is 5. If I understand the statement of the chairman, 6 concurred in this report, and 1 did not.

Mr. PENROSE. No; three were against it. Four to three was the vote.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Was the vote 4 to 3?

Mr. PENROSE. Yes. The proxy is only a courtesy.

Mr. SWANSON. The proxy would not be counted?

Mr. PENROSE. No; you can not vote a proxy.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that there were only 4 who concurred, and 5 are required to make a report.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. PENROSE. For an inquiry.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I wish to take the floor in my own time, if the Chair will allow me, and I ask the privilege of doing so before he decides this question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has ruled, and unless there is an appeal his decision will stand. There is not any doubt about it in the mind of the Chair.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. There is one question of fact that has not been drawn to the attention of the Chair. It is undoubtedly the privilege of committees to allow the votes of absentees to be recorded. Has the chairman of the committee advised the President of the Senate as to whether the two who were there by proxy had authorized reporting the joint resolution?

Mr. PENROSE. Voting by proxy is a good deal abused in committees. Certainly the Senate rule only recognizes a vote of actual Senators present in the committee. The Chair has ruled on it?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has ruled on it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I should like to ask if the ruling of the Chair goes to the extent of holding that where a committee agrees that an absent member shall be allowed to vote and have his vote recorded that that is prohibited by the rule of the Senate? I do not understand that the Senator from South Carolina, the chairman of the committee, has expressed himself on that subject and given that information to the Senate.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. In reply to that, I am sure that one member of those who were absent left a proxy to be counted as a quorum and voted as the majority voted.

Mr. PENROSE. Can the Senator state what Senator?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. No; it is not necessary, for he can state it himself.

Mr. PENROSE. Then any absentee will cover that statement.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Those were the votes that made the majority.

Mr. POMERENE. The chairman does not mean that the Senator's vote was cast?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. No; it was only those present who voted, but they asked to be counted as proxies.

Mr. President, I want to have the matter clearly understood. Of course I see the object. The majority of those who were present followed out the invariable rule, the invariable custom. There is pending right now another bill, in which I am sure an investigation will reveal the fact that not a majority of those present formed a majority of the committee, and those voting to report it out did not pass it with a majority of half the committee. I am going to appeal from the decision of the Chair, because of the custom of the Senate and the custom of our committee and in the interest of the expedition of business. I am going to appeal from the decision of the Chair on its ruling, because it seems to me that this matter is of such import that if it applies to this committee, in justice to all parties concerned we must apply it to other committees.

Mr. PENROSE. It ought to apply to all if one raises an objection.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. It ought to apply as a matter of course to all if it is made to apply to one.

Mr. PENROSE. I should like to address an inquiry to the Senator. Does he mean to assert that the custom of a committee can override a rule of the Senate?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. That is not the question to which I am addressing myself. I am addressing myself to the custom which has grown up here, that has not been questioned. That is the only question now. The reasons have been stated, and the committee from time to time have done what I have asserted. We have what is called a working quorum, and by a majority of that quorum important legislation has been reported out.

Mr. KENYON. I wish to address an inquiry to the Senator from South Carolina. Does the Senator claim that one member of the committee can come in and say "I cast the vote of three or four others" and report out a bill?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. The point is this: The committee get together and agree what shall be a working quorum. Knowing the impossibility of getting members in because of the conflicting meetings of different committees, they get together and form what is known as their working quorum. They go to work with that quorum, and they reach a decision by a majority of that working quorum and report out a bill.

Mr. KENYON. Can they have a quorum contrary to the rule of the Senate?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. They do, as the Senator knows.

Mr. KENYON. I know it is a vicious practice. I have seen men come in the committee room and vote two or three other Senators on a matter that came up. It is a matter that ought to be stopped.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. As the Senator from Iowa knows, if that rule was not adhered to it would practically stop the business of this body.

Mr. KENYON. I do not think so. It is the business of the members of the committees to be there or else they ought to get off the committee.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. It is almost impossible to keep from duplicating the meetings of the committees. I maintain here and now that in all good faith the Committee on Interstate Commerce met and considered what in their judgment was best, and, acting according to the rule and custom, we never any more questioned it than I would question the right of the Senator from Iowa to leave this Chamber and go to his home without reporting to anybody about it, because we take it for granted that he would not leave without a just and reasonable cause.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I do not care to enter into the merits of this question, as to what may be done in regard to telegraph and telephones, but the Senator certainly is mistaken when he states what is the rule in committees. It is true that less than a majority of the committee may constitute a working majority, as you say, and where that working majority is unanimous upon directing the committee to report, the bill may be reported; but I know of no committee, and I serve on a number, where less than a quorum, divided as this one was, can authorize the report of a bill. One might as well say that the chairman can report a bill without calling the committee.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. No; the working majority. A majority is a working quorum, and I maintain that it is justified by usage and that that is a rule of this body.

Mr. WARREN. If the Senator will allow me, furthermore, the rules of this body are printed, and the Senator may say that some committee may have substituted something as its own rule, but the rule of one committee does not bind the Senate and it should not bind it.

Mr. SWANSON. I understand the committee is composed of 17 members, and under a rule which we passed six constitute a quorum to do business. Then five must concur in the action of the committee. I think in most of the committees on which I serve that have 17 members we have passed such a resolution. It can not be done unless they agree to it.

Mr. WARREN. Is that a majority of the committee in that case? Do five members make a majority?

Mr. SWANSON. The six constitute it.

Mr. WARREN. A committee report carries on its face evidence that the majority of the committee has had under consideration the subject and reports favorably or unfavorably upon it.

Mr. SWANSON. A majority, which would be five, have a right to concur to make the report under that rule.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, I wish to make just one remark and then I am done. I said that I would appeal from the decision of the Chair. I believe I will withdraw that for a very obvious reason. I want to state that this has been a custom. It has amounted to a rule. Your committee, with the full knowledge of the responsibility that is on it and the necessity that was upon it and the facts that were divulged to it, brought in this report as the opinion of the majority of its working quorum. If the Senate wants to reverse it and delay the measure and go through a procedure that was not the opinion of a majority of those present, it can take the responsibility. I, as chairman, acting with the majority of that committee, did what in our opinion was for the best interests of the matter in hand, and certainly the best interests of the country, and we did it for that reason and that alone. Now, if that is to be reversed and the custom of the Senate is to be upset, let the responsibility be elsewhere than upon the chairman of the committee and those who acted with him.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, this I regard as a very important measure. I realize that when it came to the question of a report from this committee the vote stood 4 in favor of it and 3 against it as a substitute motion for one which I interposed to the effect that we should begin the hearings to-morrow and then hear the Government officials, and on the day following the officers of the various companies interested, and on the third day the employees; and that we should determine later whether further time should be granted or not to any of these classes of witnesses.

Mr. President, I am exceedingly sorry that I must differ from any of my colleagues. It may be that after deliberation I would come to the same conclusion that four of my colleagues on the committee have reached; but it is my judgment that under all of the circumstances good faith on the part of this committee and good faith on the part of the Senate requires that these different interests should be permitted to be heard by the committee before we take snap judgment against them.

For one Member of the Senate, I am free to say now that when an emergency requires immediate action I shall be among the first to act, but until I can be shown that the emergency does, in fact, exist it is my humble judgment that those parties who are so gravely interested in the consequences of our action here should at least be briefly heard.

Now, Mr. President, what is the situation? It is true that for perhaps a week or more Members of both Houses have been talking about a recess. This was uppermost in the minds of Senators on Saturday.

After certain conferences among the leaders of the Senate, I called the members of the Interstate Commerce Committee together, in the absence of the chairman. There were, I think, at the first meeting nine members present. After a brief intermission the resolution was adopted, which was presented by me to the Senate this morning and to which the Senator from Pennsylvania refers. Seven members concurred in that resolution and no one opposed it. It was given to the press. Everyone believed that reasonable hearings were to be held. The senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], who is one of the very active members of the committee, was extremely anxious that there should be hearings, and he left the Capital to attend to some matters in his home State in the full confidence that we were to have hearings. I had no doubt about it. Five minutes before the report was authorized by the four members of the committee I did not believe that a report would be made without hearings.

Now, let us see what this situation is——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, will the Senator pardon me there?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. POMERENE. I yield.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. How many members of the committee are there?

Mr. POMERENE. There are 17 members of the committee, 9 constituting a majority. Under the rules of the Senate, as I recall, the Committee on Interstate Commerce provided that seven members should constitute a quorum; but, of course, under the rule of the Senate as read it would require more than half of a majority of the committee to authorize a favorable report to the Senate; in other words, five members.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. But the fact remains that, out of a committee of 17 members, less than one-quarter have precipitated this matter before the Senate.

Mr. POMERENE. That is true. Mr. President, these interests are very large. I recognize the fact in this country there are two schools of thought when it comes to the subject of telephones and the telegraphs. One favors public ownership; the other private ownership. That question is not involved here at the present time; but there is involved the taking over of these properties and their control. If the question were limited to the telegraph companies alone, it would probably simplify the responsibilities which rest upon the committee and upon the Senate; but this joint resolution involves the telephone companies as well as the telegraph companies.

I am informed that in the State of Iowa alone there are 3,000 telephone companies; in the State of Minnesota some 1,700; and my belief is that in my own State there is something over 3,000 of them. Some of these companies are prosperous; some of them are not prosperous; some of them perhaps have surpluses, while others have deficits at the end of the year. If we take them over, how are we to control them? How are we to finance them? By what department shall they be administered? What, if anything, ought we to do with respect to these features of the case to which I have just called attention? I recognize the fact that some men have more intellectual capacity than I have and can determine these questions instanter. I have not been endowed with ability enough to do that, and my judgment is that both the stockholders and the employees ought to be permitted at least to present their views to the committee.

I am sorry if I differ from any of my colleagues, but I do. I do not believe it is imperative that we act at once. I think we ought to go on with the hearings, and after we have heard from all sides, then report to the Senate what in our judgment ought to be done.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an inquiry there?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. POMERENE. I do.

Mr. PENROSE. I ask the Senator whether that would not really expedite the consideration of the matter, instead of having the joint resolution reported back to the Senate without any consideration whatever? The committee could save the time of the Senate by going into the matter, and it would in that way curtail discussion after the joint resolution was reported.

Mr. POMERENE. Why, Mr. President, I do not now recall a bill which has been reported to the Senate without a recommendation based upon hearings that did not involve very extensive discussion afterwards; and I am quite sure that, whatever may be my predisposition upon this subject, I can vote upon it with greater satisfaction to myself after we have heard from all parties concerned than I can without hearing from them.

Mr. GORE. What is the pending question, Mr. President?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands the Senator from South Carolina does not desire to press his appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. GORE. The Senator from South Carolina has so announced.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Very well; the Chair so understands.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. GORE. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, July 9, 1918, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, July 8, 1918.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou eternal, invisible, yet ever-present God, our Heavenly Father, from whom cometh all wisdom, power, and goodness, continue, we beseech Thee, Thy ministrations and help us to grow into all that makes men holy; thus into all that makes a nation pure and noble, wise and just, strong and great.

Make straight our paths and lead on to the consummation of Thy purposes, for which all true men long; for Thine is the kingdom and the power and the glory forever. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday, July 6, 1918, was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 3438. An act to prevent corrupt practices in the election of Senators, Representatives, or Delegates in Congress.

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bill of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee, as indicated below:

S. 3438. An act to prevent corrupt practices in the election of Senators, Representatives, or Delegates in Congress; to the Committee on Election of President, Vice President, and Representatives in Congress.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. LAZARO, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 8938. An act to equip the United States penitentiary, Atlanta, Ga., for the manufacture of supplies for the use of the Government, for the compensation of prisoners for their labor, and for other purposes.

ENROLLED BILLS PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. LAZARO, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States for his approval the following bills:

H. R. 8938. An act to equip the United States penitentiary, Atlanta, Ga., for the manufacture of supplies for the use of the Government, for the compensation of prisoners for their labor, and for other purposes; and

H. R. 11048. An act to amend the war-risk insurance act.

WATER-POWER LEGISLATION.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky rose.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky is recognized.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I want to make a request for unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will proceed.

Mr. SIMS. Might I have about one minute in which to make a statement?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent for one minute. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SIMS. The object of asking this unanimous-consent request is to try to fix a date for the consideration of the water-power bill (S. 1419). I have tried to find out from members of the Water Power Committee as to their convenience, as I am ready at any time to begin its consideration; but I do not believe it will be convenient for the members of the committee, as well as quite a number of other Members of the House, to begin the consideration of that bill this week. So I was going to suggest unanimous consent that we take up the bill for consideration under the general rules of the House on next Monday, and give way to conference reports, appropriation bills, and other privileged matters.

Mr. FOSTER. Next Monday is unanimous-consent day.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. SIMS. And I want to say further that it is not going to take so long to consider this bill as some Members think. While there is a minority report it is only as to one feature of the bill. There has been much general discussion in the House heretofore on water-power bills, and as a result Members are more or less familiar with water-power questions.

Mr. STEENERSON. When does the gentleman propose to take up the bridge bills?

Mr. SIMS. My intention is to try to get them all considered the first day this week that I can, because there is no opposition to any of them.

Mr. STEENERSON. No; but they have been neglected.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for one minute.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] asks unanimous consent for one minute. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS], the chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, has been most insistent that the House should stay here and do business, and has said he wanted to pass this bill. We have stayed here much against our convenience. I think the bill ought to be taken up right away. I do not see why the convenience of the members of the committee should be especially considered. [Applause.] I think we ought to take it up to-morrow. The House has been kept here when the Members wanted to go away.

Mr. SIMS. Out of consideration for the requests of the Members that have been made to me personally, I think the gentleman himself ought to make that request.

Mr. GILLETT. They ought to be here to-morrow. Why are they not here?

Mr. SIMS. They left under the idea that there would be a recess, and it is not my fault or the gentleman's fault.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman has charge of the bill and should make the request.

Mr. SIMS. Then, Mr. Speaker, I make the request that this bill be in order.

The SPEAKER. The water-power bill?

Mr. SIMS. Yes. There has only one been reported. I ask unanimous consent that it be considered under the general rules of the House, beginning to-morrow.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I do not think this bill ought to be considered under the general rules of the House. The bill reported by the committee is an amendment to the Senate bill, and of course it would be rather inconvenient to consider it in that form. If the House bill can be considered as an original bill, of course, I have no objection.

Mr. SIMS. I would ask, as a matter of course, that when we begin the consideration of the bill that we consider the substitute as though it was a House bill, and reported by the committee as such, and subject to amendment by section and paragraph.

Mr. ANDERSON. Let the gentleman ask it now.

Mr. SIMS. I will ask in connection with the consideration of the bill that unanimous consent be given to consider the substitute as though it was an original House bill, and after it has been completed then it be voted on as an amendment to the Senate bill.

Mr. HELM. Reserving the right to object, that, of course, would give opportunity for general debate?

Mr. SIMS. As a matter of course.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. WALSH. Reserving the right to object, might I ask the gentleman from Tennessee how much general debate he expects to ask on this measure?

Mr. SIMS. Well, Mr. Speaker, I had this idea about it, that we would begin the general debate without a limit and see how we would get along, and then try to arrange a limitation later on if found to be necessary.

Mr. WALSH. Might I ask another question? The gentleman has no measure pending in his committee which might suddenly be discovered to be of paramount importance to the water-power bill and sidetrack it, as happened recently, has he?

Mr. SIMS. There is nothing now before the committee that I would regard as an emergency war measure.

Mr. WALSH. Nothing accumulating in the atmosphere?

Mr. SIMS. I am not an inhabitant of the atmosphere, and consequently I can not say.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] asks unanimous consent that the water-power bill be taken up to-morrow and be the continuing order, subject to conference reports, and so forth, appropriation bills, and matters on the Speaker's table, and, of course, it does not bar Calendar Wednesday; to consider the original bill——

Mr. ANDERSON. The House amendment as an original bill?

The SPEAKER. Yes; the House amendment as an original bill.

Mr. SIMS. As a House bill.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. STEENERSON. Will this continuing order supersede the business in order next Monday, set aside for the Unanimous Consent Calendar?

The SPEAKER. No. That is excepted, too. Is there objection?

Mr. ELLSWORTH. I object.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair, if nobody objects, would like to make a statement himself.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. In a minute, unless the gentleman wishes to object. The Chair is opposed to doing away with the unanimous-consent business and suspension-day business on Monday. That is proposition No. 1. Those things ought to be attended to. They have been shoved out of the way for a considerable time, and some are very important to particular Members. There ought to be a day set apart before long to consider bills on the Private Calendar. [Applause.] Some of them are very important. Gentlemen have acted very nicely about it. They have not raised any disturbance, but a great many of these bills on the Private Calendar are of general importance in a way, and all of them are important to certain Members, and it is nothing but fair that they should have a day in court.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request, that——

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. Evidently there is none.

CALL OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina moves a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will open the doors.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. SANDERS of Indiana, now confined in the hospital since July 4, indefinitely, on account of illness.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I want to submit the same unanimous-consent request that I did before, as I understand the gentleman will not object since a quorum has developed. The unanimous-consent request is that we take up the water-power bill (S. 1419) to-morrow for consideration and consider the House amendment to the Senate bill as a House bill, subject to Calendar Wednesday and suspension day next Monday, and to any privileged matters like conference reports, appropriation bills, and other privileged business.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that to-morrow the water-power bill shall be taken up, the House amendment to be considered as an original bill, to be a continuing order, except not to shut out Calendar Wednesday, or unanimous-consent day, or conference reports, or other privileged matters. Is there objection?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Tennessee, how long he thinks that bill will take?

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, my recollection is that the other water-power bills did not take more than two or three days. One of them, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, dealt alone with navigable streams. Another one, from the Committee on the Public Lands, dealt with water-power on public lands. This bill deals with all combined water-power legislation, and naturally it will take longer. But I do not think it will take, even with due and fair consideration, more than two or three days. But I can not possibly tell.

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, if this bill is passed and the Unanimous-Consent Calendar is disposed of, would the gentleman be in favor of a recess of Congress?

Mr. SIMS. I will answer that question when the time comes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I object.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin object?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I do.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA BUSINESS.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, there were two bills on the House Calendar, both introduced by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM], relative to killing and trapping birds in the District of Columbia. One of them was passed and the other remains on the calendar. I ask that it be stricken from the calendar. It is the bill H. R. 7360.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky asks that the bill H. R. 7360 be stricken from the calendar.

Mr. GARNER. Move that it lie on the table.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I ask that it lie on the table.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 7360) to prohibit the killing, trapping, netting, ensnaring, hunting, having in possession, and sale of certain wild birds in the District of Columbia.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that that bill be stricken from the calendar. Is there objection?

Mr. CARY. Reserving the right to object, this is a bill that passed?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. No. As I said in explanation, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM] introduced two bills. The one he desired to be passed has already been passed by the House. This other has been uselessly carried on the calendar.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Now, Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering District legislation; and, pending that, I would like to get, if possible, an agreement with the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. CARY] as to the time for general debate.

PENSIONS—CONFERENCE REPORT (NO. 748).

Mr. SHOUSE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up the conference report on the bill (H. R. 12229) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war. I think this conference report has the preference.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, we have already a motion before the House.

The SPEAKER. The rule is that the conference report takes precedence. The Clerk will read the conference report.

Mr. SHOUSE. I ask unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. Has this conference report been printed?

Mr. SHOUSE. It was printed in the RECORD of Saturday.

The Clerk read the statement of the House conferees.

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 12229) entitled "An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war," having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

Amendment numbered 5: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 5, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$32"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 6: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 6, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$36"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 11: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 11, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Restore the matter stricken out, amended to read as follows:

"The name of Emma L. Randall, widow of George W. Randall, late of Company B, One hundred and ninety-fourth Regiment, New York Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $12 per month."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 35: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 35, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$36"; and the Senate agree to the same.

WILLIAM A. ASHBROOK,
JOUETT SHOUSE,
JNO. W. LANGLEY,
Managers on part of House.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHOUSE. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH. I notice that this statement was read from the RECORD and not from the original papers. I should like to ask the gentleman where the papers are?

Mr. SHOUSE. The papers were filed on Saturday, and I presume they are in the hands of the Public Printer.

Mr. WALSH. The papers are in the possession of the House?

Mr. SHOUSE. They are in the possession of the House. They were filed Saturday.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Speaker, I notice that amendment No. 13 reduces the pension of Newton Sigsby from $30 to $21. Can the gentleman give some idea as to why that was done?

Mr. SHOUSE. The man in question is not eligible to a pension under the general law, having served only 84 days, from February 17, 1865, to May 11, 1865, when the war was practically over. He was given a special pension on account of disabilities which originated in the service, but except for the special act under which he is proposed to be pensioned he would not be entitled to a pension at all.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. That is quite true, but since he is entitled to a pension, why make it $21 instead of $30? This man was entitled to a pension for disability incurred in the service.

Mr. SHOUSE. He was not granted a pension under the general law, but he is given the rate that he would draw under the general law.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. He filed his application for a pension 40 years ago, and it pended in the bureau for 15 or 20 years. If it had been allowed in the bureau, he would have received several thousand dollars of back pension, which he did not receive under the special act.

Mr. SHOUSE. He would not have received more than $21 per month.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. But he would have been drawing it all this time.

Mr. SHOUSE. That is not the fault of the committee. The committee never attempts to correct action of the bureau which denies a man back pension.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I should like to know what the committee is for then?

Mr. SHOUSE. The committee is for the purpose of granting special pensions to people that it considers deserving, who are not entitled to pensions under existing law. This man was refused a pension by the bureau.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. This is exactly that case.

Mr. SHOUSE. Now, the committee, on account of his disability, think it is fair to pension him at the rate of pension that he would have received under the general law.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman explain the change of policy of the committee in granting pensions to men who served less than 90 days?

Mr. HASTINGS. My understanding is that we had a case up last year where a man served less than 90 days and that the committee disallowed the pension. I remember the Morton case very well.

Mr. SHOUSE. I will say to the gentleman that my recollection is that the committee in the last Congress placed a limit of 87 days as the lowest limit under any circumstances under which they granted a special pension act. This year we have placed the limit at either 83 or 84 days; I have forgotten which. The clerk of the committee can tell the gentleman. It is a matter that was acted upon by the committee as a definite policy.

Mr. HASTINGS. What is the reason for the change of policy?

Mr. SHOUSE. The committee thought that in exceptional cases it was proper to do so.

Mr. HASTINGS. I just wanted to know what was the policy of the committee; that is all.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman from Kansas kindly elaborate his statement as to the policy that the committee follows in granting pensions to those who served less than 90 days? I have been under the impression and was informed only recently by the clerk of the committee that they were not considering any cases where the service was less than 87 days. Here is a case, to which attention was called by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON], where the soldier served 84 days.

Mr. SHOUSE. Either the clerk of the committee was mistaken in his statement or the gentleman misunderstood him, because there have been several cases in this Congress and in previous Congresses, since I have been a member of the committee, where pensions were granted for service of less than 90 days, under very unusual circumstances and in very deserving cases.

Mr. STAFFORD. What are those unusual conditions?

Mr. SHOUSE. Where a man seems to have pretty clear proof of disabilities of service origin, but where the bureau did not take the view the committee took. The case the gentleman from Alabama cited was pending in the Pension Bureau for many years, and finally was turned down, and the committee felt that there was enough justice in the case to warrant the action by special act to grant a pension of $21.

Mr. STAFFORD. The committee does not report favorably any pension to any soldier who did not serve 90 days unless he has something to base a claim for injuries of service origin?

Mr. SHOUSE. Exactly.

Mr. PLATT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHOUSE. Yes.

Mr. PLATT. Was not the case the gentleman referred to pending so long in the Pension Bureau, where a soldier had made a claim for service over 90 days?

Mr. SHOUSE. No; he had served 84 days at the close of the war.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHOUSE. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. It is not a change of law; the general law requires 90 days' service.

Mr. SHOUSE. No; if the gentleman will permit, the general law as contrasted with the act of May 11, 1912, provides for pensions where a man has disabilities of service origin regardless of service——

Mr. CANNON. That I understand; but this is a claim where it was turned down by the Commissioner of Pensions, saying the proof was not sufficient that the injury resulted in the service in the line of duty. Now, my recollection is that that has been frequently done by special act where it has been turned down by the Pension Office where the service had been longer than 90 days.

Mr. SHOUSE. The gentleman knows that under existing law any soldier of 90 days' service is entitled to a pension, and increases have been granted where the bureau has refused them.

Mr. CANNON. That is the same principle. I think if the committee was satisfied from the proof submitted that the Commissioner of Pensions made a mistake in turning it down there is every reason in justice and equity to give the man a pension.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The question was taken, and the conference report was agreed to.

MINIMUM WAGE BOARD FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of District business.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee in the chair.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I call up the bill (H. R. 12098) to protect the lives and health and morals of women and minor workers in the District of Columbia, and to establish a minimum wage board, and define its powers and duties, and to provide for the fixing of minimum wages for such workers, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That where used in this act—

The term "board" means the minimum wage board created by section 2;

The term "commissioners" means the Commissioners of the District of Columbia;

The term "woman" includes only a woman of 18 years of age or over;

The term "minor" means a person of either sex under the age of 18 years;

The term "occupation" includes a business, industry, trade, or branch thereof.

SEC. 2. That there is hereby created a board to be known as the "minimum wage board," to be composed of three members to be appointed by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia. As far as practicable, the members shall be so chosen that one will represent the interests of the employing class, one the interests of the employed class, and the third will be fair and impartial between employers and employees and work for the best interests of the public as a whole.

The commissioners shall make their first appointments hereunder within 30 days after this act takes effect and shall designate one of the three members first appointed to hold office until January 1, 1919; one to hold office until January 1, 1920; and one to hold office until January 1, 1921. On or before the 1st day of January of each year, beginning with the year 1919, the commissioners shall appoint a member to succeed the member whose term expires on such 1st day of January, and such new appointee shall hold office for the term of three years from such 1st day of January. Each member shall hold office until his successor is appointed and has qualified; and any vacancy that may occur in the membership of the board shall be filled by appointment by the commissioners for the unexpired portion of the term.

A majority of the members shall constitute a quorum to transact business, and the act or decision of such a majority shall be deemed the act or decision of the board; and no vacancy shall impair the right of the remaining members to exercise all the powers of the board.

SEC. 3. That the first members appointed shall, within 20 days after their appointment, meet and organize the board by electing one of their number as chairman and by choosing a secretary, who shall not be a member of the board; and on or before the 10th day of January of each year thereafter the board shall elect a chairman and choose a secretary for the ensuing year. The chairman and the secretary shall each hold office until his successor is elected or chosen, but the board may at any time remove the secretary. The secretary shall perform such duties as may be prescribed and receive such salary, not in excess of $2,500 per annum, as may be fixed by the board. None of the members shall receive any salary as such. The board shall have power to employ agents and such other assistants as may be necessary for the proper performance of its duties: Provided, That until further authorization by Congress the sum which it may expend, including the salary of the secretary, shall not exceed the sum of $5,000.

SEC. 4. That at any public hearing held by the board any person interested in the matter being investigated may appear and testify. Any member of the board shall have power to administer oaths, and the board may require by subpœna the attendance and testimony of witnesses, the production of all books, registers, and other evidence relative to any matters under investigation at any such public hearing or at any session of any conference held as hereinafter provided. In case of disobedience to a subpœna the board may invoke the aid of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia in requiring the attendance and testimony of witnesses and the production of documentary evidence. In case of contumacy or refusal to obey a subpœna the court may issue an order requiring appearance before the board, the production of documentary evidence, and the giving of evidence touching the matter in question, and any failure to obey such order of the court may be punished by such court as a contempt thereof.

SEC. 5. That the board is hereby authorized and empowered to make rules and regulations for the carrying into effect of this act, including rules and regulations for the selection of members of the conferences hereinafter provided for and the mode of procedure thereof.

SEC. 6. That the board shall, on or before the 1st day of January of the year 1919, and of each year thereafter, make a report to the commissioners of its work and the proceedings under this act.

SEC. 7. That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of the revenues of the District of Columbia, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, the sum of $5,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to carry into effect the provisions of this act.

SEC. 8. That the board shall have full power and authority: (1) To investigate and ascertain the wages of women and minors in the different occupations in which they are employed in the District of Columbia; (2) to examine, through any member or authorized representative, any book, pay roll, or other record of any employer of women or minors that in any way appertains to or has a bearing upon the question of wages of any such women or minors; and (3) to require from such employer full and true statements of the wages paid to all women and minors in his employment.

Every employer shall keep a register of the names of the women and minors employed by him in any occupation in the District of Columbia, of the hours worked by each, and of all payments made to each, whether paid by the time or by the piece; and shall, on request, permit any member or authorized representative of the board to examine such register.

To assist the board in carrying out this act the commissioners shall at all times give it any information or statistics in their possession under the act of Congress approved February 24, 1914, entitled "An act to regulate the hours of employment and safeguard the health of females employed in the District of Columbia." (Public, No. 60, 63d Cong.)

SEC. 9. That the board is hereby authorized and empowered to ascertain and declare, in the manner hereinafter provided, the following things: (a) Standards of minimum wages for women in any occupation within the District of Columbia, and what wages are inadequate to supply the necessary cost of living to any such women workers to maintain them in good health and to protect their morals; and (b) standards of minimum wages for minors in any occupation within the District of Columbia, and what wages are unreasonably low for any such minor workers.

SEC. 10. That if, after investigation, the board is of opinion that any substantial number of women workers in any occupation are receiving wages inadequate to supply them with the necessary cost of living and maintain them in health and protect their morals, it may call and convene a conference for the purpose and with the powers of considering and inquiring into and reporting on the subject investigated by the board and submitted by it to such conference. The conference shall be composed of not more than three representatives of the employers in such occupation, of an equal number of representatives of the employees in such occupation, of not more than three disinterested persons representing the public, and of one or more members of the board. The board shall name and appoint all the members of the conference and designate the chairman thereof. Two-thirds of the members of the conference shall constitute a quorum, and the decision or recommendation or report of the conference on any subject submitted shall require a vote of not less than a majority of all its members.

The board shall present to the conference all the information and evidence in its possession or control relating to the subject of the inquiry by the conference, and shall cause to be brought before the conference any witnesses whose testimony the board deems material.

SEC. 11. That after completing its consideration of and inquiry into the subject submitted to it by the board, the conference shall make and transmit to the board a report containing its findings and recommendations on such subject, including recommendations as to standards of minimum wages for women workers in the occupation under inquiry and as to what wages are inadequate to supply the necessary cost of living to women workers in such occupation and to maintain them in health and to protect their morals.

In its recommendations on a question of wages the conference (1) shall, where it appears that any substantial number of women workers in the occupation under inquiry are being paid by piece rates as distinguished from time rate, recommend minimum piece rates as well as minimum time rate and recommend such minimum piece rates as will, in its judgment, be adequate to supply the necessary cost of living to women workers in such occupation of average ordinary ability and to maintain them in health and protect their morals; and (2) shall, when it appears proper or necessary, recommend suitable minimum wages for learners and apprentices in such occupation and the maximum length of time any woman worker may be kept at such wages as a learner or apprentice, which wages shall be less than the regular minimum wages recommended for the regular women workers in such occupation.

SEC. 12. That, upon receipt of any report from any conference, the board shall consider and review the recommendations, and may approve or disapprove any or all of such recommendations, and may resubmit to the same conference, or a new conference, any subject covered by any recommendations so disapproved.

If the board approves any recommendations contained in any report from any conference, it shall publish a notice, once a week, for four successive weeks in a newspaper of general circulation printed in the District of Columbia, that it will, on a date and at a place named in the notice, hold a public hearing at which all persons in favor of or opposed to such recommendations will be heard.

After such hearing the board may, in its discretion, make and render such an order as may be proper or necessary to adopt such recommendations and carry them into effect, requiring all employers in the occupation affected thereby to observe and comply with such order. Such order shall become effective 60 days after it is made. After such order becomes effective, and while it is effective, it shall be unlawful for any employer to violate or disregard any of its terms or provisions, or to employ any woman worker in any occupation covered by such order at lower wages than are authorized or permitted therein.

The board shall, as far as is practicable, mail a copy of such order to every employer affected thereby; and every employer affected by any such order shall keep a copy thereof posted in a conspicuous place in each room in his establishment in which women workers are employed.

SEC. 13. That for any occupation in which only a minimum time-rate wage has been established, the board may issue to a woman physically defective or crippled by age or otherwise impaired, a special license authorizing her employment at such wage less than such minimum time-rate wage as shall be fixed by the board and stated in the license.

SEC. 14. That the board may at any time inquire into wages of minors employed in any occupation in the District of Columbia and determine suitable wages for them. When the board has made such determination it may make such an order as may be proper or necessary to carry such determination into effect. Such order shall become effective 60 days after it is made; and after such order becomes effective and while it is effective it shall be unlawful for any employer in such occupation to employ a minor at less wages than are specified or required in or by such order.

SEC. 15. That any conference may make a separate inquiry into and report on any branch of any occupation, and the board may make a separate order affecting any branch of any occupation.

SEC. 16. That the board shall from time to time investigate and ascertain whether or not employers in the District of Columbia are observing and complying with its orders, and shall report to the corporation counsel of the District of Columbia all violations of this act.

SEC. 17. That all questions of fact arising under the foregoing provisions of this act shall, except as otherwise herein provided, be determined by the board, and there shall be no appeal from the decision of the board on any such question of fact; but there shall be a right of appeal from the board to the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia from any ruling or holding on a question of law included or embodied in any decision or order of the board; and, on the same question of law, from such court to the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia. In all such appeals the corporation counsel shall appear for and represent the board.

SEC. 18. That whoever violates this act, whether an employer or his agent, or the director, officer, or agent of any corporation, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor; and, upon conviction thereof, shall be punished by a fine of not less than $25 nor more than $100, or by imprisonment not less than 10 days nor more than 3 months, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

SEC. 19. That any employer and his agent, or the director, officer, or agent of any corporation, who discharges or in any other manner discriminates against any employee because such employee has served or is about to serve on any conference, or has testified or is about to testify, or because such employer believes that said employee may serve on any conference or may testify in any investigation or proceedings under or relative to this act, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, upon conviction thereof, shall be punished by a fine of not less than $25 nor more than $100.

SEC. 20. That any act which, if done or omitted to be done by any agent or officer or director acting for such employer, would constitute a violation of this act, shall also be held to be a violation by the employer and subject such employer to the liability provided for by this act.

SEC. 21. That prosecutions for violations of this act shall be on information filed in the police court of the District of Columbia by the corporation counsel.

SEC. 22. That if any woman worker is paid by her employer less than the minimum wage to which she is entitled under or by virtue of an order of the board, she may recover in a civil action the full amount of such minimum wage, less any amount actually paid to her by the employer, together with such reasonable attorney's fees as may be allowed by the court, and any agreement for her to work for less than such minimum wage shall be no defense to such action.

SEC. 23. That this act shall be known as the "District of Columbia minimum-wage law." The purposes of the act are to protect the women and minors of the District from conditions detrimental to their health and morals, resulting from wages which are inadequate to maintain decent standards of living, and the act in each of its provisions and in its entirety shall be interpreted to effectuate these purposes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. HILLIARD] will have charge of the bill, and I yield my time to him.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado is recognized for an hour.

Mr. HILLIARD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING], the author of the bill.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, this is a bill to establish a minimum-wage board in the District of Columbia. The bill is based on the Oregon law, which has been sustained by the courts of that State and by the Supreme Court of the United States. Therefore there is little question as to the legality of this legislation. The need of the legislation, so far as the District of Columbia is concerned, is shown by the report made by the Bureau of Labor Statistics of the Department of Labor, acting under a resolution adopted by this House.

The subcommittee of the Committee on the District of Columbia, which considered this bill, has submitted a very full and interesting report to the House, which was prepared by my friend and colleague, Mr. HILLIARD, of Colorado. I would ask every Member of the House to read that report, because I believe it contains all the information needed for the proper consideration of this bill.

It is significant that for the first time in the history of legislation of this character employers and employees have been able to come together on a satisfactory bill. When the committee was holding its hearings the first witness to appear was the representative of the Business Men's Association of the District of Columbia, Mr. Columbus. He represented practically all the business concerns which would be subject to this act, and he assured the committee that the business men, after examining the legislation, were convinced it was fair. The committee also heard from the representatives of workers in various industries, representatives of the American Federation of Labor, and social workers who devote special attention to women and children in industry.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEATING. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Does the bill include women employed as domestic servants?

Mr. KEATING. That would be a matter to be determined by the board. If the gentleman will read the bill——

Mr. LONGWORTH. I have read the bill.

Mr. KEATING. It is within the power of the board to consider various industries, one at a time. It would, I think, be within the power of the board, if it saw fit after proper investigation, to consider the condition of those engaged in domestic service.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The board could class that as one of the industries?

Mr. KEATING. I presume so.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Does the gentleman think that is advisable? There is a provision compelling every employer to register every employee and the amount of the wages. Does the gentleman think that would be advisable, to compel the employer of women servants to register their names and the amount of their wages?

Mr. KEATING. I do not know that any employer would object to it. In the first place, the gentleman will bear in mind—because the objection was urged with some force by a lady who visited my office—the only thing the legislation provides is that the worker shall be given a living wage. That is the basis of the whole thing.

I submit that the man or woman who desires a servant should be prepared to pay that worker a living wage, and I know the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] agrees with me that the person who can not afford to pay a servant a sufficient amount to enable the servant to live decently should be compelled to do his or her own work.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEATING. In a moment. As far as I know, no board clothed with these powers has undertaken to go into the problem of domestic servants which, as the gentleman will recognize and as I recognize, is very intricate.

Mr. WALSH. I think the gentleman has already answered that which I was about to ask, and that is whether in Oregon or any of these 10 other States domestic service, or the work which servants do, has been classed as an industry?

Mr. KEATING. So far as I know it has not been.

Mr. WALSH. So that there is no precedent for the board created by this act to class that occupation as an industry.

Mr. KEATING. No; there is no precedent, and I confess that I can see where the matter might be argued. It would be a matter, it seems to me, for the board first of all to decide, and it is entirely conceivable that eventually that might be subjected to judicial review, but the measure is drawn in such a way as to safeguard the rights of the employer quite as much as the rights of the employee.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Is the Government also regarded as an employer?

Mr. KEATING. I do not think the Government would be regarded as an employer under this act. At least, there is no necessity, in my judgment, for any such provision as that, and it was not so intended.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEATING. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. I have not read the bill, but is it designed to fix the hours of labor?

Mr. KEATING. No. Perhaps it would be well for me to tell just what the bill does. The bill, first of all, is designated to safeguard women and children in industry. It does not go outside of that. The wage to be determined is the minimum wage, the living wage, the irreducible minimum, below which you can not sustain life and live in a decent American way.

The bill provides that the Commissioners of the District of Columbia shall appoint a commission consisting of three members, and in that connection the bill states that, as far as practicable, the members of the board shall be so chosen that one "shall represent the interests of the employing class, one the interests of the employee class, and the third will be fair and impartial between employers and employees and work for the best interests of the public as a whole."

The board may call a conference for the purpose of considering and reporting on the subjects suggested by the board and submitted by it to such conference.

The conference shall be composed of not more than three representatives of the employers in the occupation under consideration, of an equal number of representatives of the employed in such occupation, and of not more than three disinterested persons representing the public, and of one or more members of the board.

This conference shall meet and go over all the evidence in connection with conditions in the particular occupation or industry under consideration, and then make a report to the board. The board may accept that report or reject it, but can not change the figures contained in the report. If the board approves the report, it has power under the provisions of this act to enforce that finding.

Mr. ROSE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEATING. Yes.

Mr. ROSE. The gentleman is a newspaper man himself, and I desire to call his attention to the provisions of section 12, on page 9, wherein it is provided that notice of any recommendations of the board contained in any report from the conference shall be published for four successive weeks in a newspaper of general circulation in the District of Columbia.

I can see trouble arising from such a condition. That is, it is possible that any single newspaper may publish itself as an official newspaper of the District of Columbia, and I suggest the advisability of having the conference reports published in not less than three newspapers of general circulation in order to avoid the difficulty likely to arise, and which is usual under such conditions.

Mr. KEATING. The object in confining it to one newspaper, of course, was to save money. Although I am a newspaper man and am in sympathy with the urgent need of securing funds for the business offices of newspapers, yet I feel that we should restrict expenditures as much as possible under this law. Personally, I think the insertion in one newspaper of general circulation would be sufficient and would not authorize the newspaper to call itself an official organ.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEATING. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The title of the bill provides that it is to protect the lives, the health, and the morals of women and minor workers in the District of Columbia. I have been wondering, since this bill has received a great deal of public attention, whether you are not going too far in this undertaking to protect or regulate the morals of women in a minimum wage bill.

Mr. KEATING. I think this is a clear exercise of the police power of the Government, and the language used was taken, as I recall it, from the Oregon law, in order, as the lawyers put it, that we might not venture too far afield and might be quite sure of the constitutionality of the act.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Well, the suggestion might be that only the poorer class is immoral?

Mr. KEATING. No; the gentleman, I am sure, fully agrees with me that when it comes to the question of morals the poor may well stand a comparison with the rich, and I am sure when the gentleman considers this bill that he will appreciate that we are not making any attempt to create a "snooping" committee to go out and investigate the morals of the poor. I think the gentleman knows me well enough to know that I would be the last to join in such an expedition. This bill is just what it purports to be on its face, and that is a bill designed to give to women and children who work a living wage.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Then why raise the question of morality at all?

Mr. KEATING. Because we are doing it under the police power, and the lawyers drafted the title, which I assume——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HILLIARD. I will yield the gentleman five minutes additional.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If the gentleman will yield for a moment more. This is an interesting question and it is an important one. Some time ago the Congress passed a bill the purpose of which was to correct the morals of the people of the District of Columbia. The gentleman knows that bill very well. Why again refer to the question of morals? The wage question and the question of the morals of the people——

Mr. KEATING. Oh, I fully agree——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Then why put it in the bill at all?

Mr. KEATING. Because the language used here is the language used in the Oregon act, as I say.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does not the gentleman think we should have some originality in the Congress of the United States in matters of this kind?

Mr. KEATING. The gentleman is quite right, but, nevertheless, I think we may, with propriety, say that the purpose of the bill is to protect the lives, health, and morals of the women and children engaged in industry by giving them a living wage, but there is absolutely nothing in it to suggest——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That far we agree——

Mr. KEATING. I can assure the gentleman that if he will consult with those who are to be benefited by the enactment of this act he will find that they are not raising objections to the title of the bill.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I hope the gentleman does not think I am trying to impede the passage of the bill.

Mr. KEATING. I acquit the gentleman of any such intention.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman said a little while ago that the report of the committee, made by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. HILLIARD], went fully into this subject and constitutes an explanation of the bill.

Mr. KEATING. A very excellent explanation.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman state whether there has been any complaint of immorality arising in the District of Columbia since the passage of the so-called Kenyon law?

Mr. KEATING. The gentleman from Colorado has no information on that subject, and of course the question of the regulation of the red-light district has nothing to do with this bill.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman's bill proposes to protect the morals of women——

Mr. KEATING. By the enactment of the minimum-wage law. I think every Member of the House appreciates the real object of the bill.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEATING. I will yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman stated the Oregon law has been upheld by the Supreme Court of the United States. I notice that it was upheld by an equally divided court, and there is no opinion written in the case. I want to ask the gentleman if he contends as the author of this measure that because the State of Oregon has the right to enact a minimum-wage law applying to persons employed in Oregon, the Congress would therefore have the right to enact a similar law as applied to the District of Columbia?

Mr. KEATING. Personally I have no doubt about the constitutionality of this bill.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman think because the Oregon law was held constitutional therefore this law would be so held?

Mr. KEATING. I think that fact would carry a great deal of weight.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. KEATING. I will.

Mr. FESS. There is no attempt in the law to fix a minimum wage?

Mr. KEATING. No; it merely provides the machinery by which the minimum wage may be determined, as I explained a few minutes ago, by the creation of the conferences on which employers and employed are represented. This is the system which prevails in Massachusetts and in other States, and the results have been so extremely gratifying——

Mr. FESS. May I ask if the board that you create by the law is supervisory or has it power to make a contract? Will the board interfere with the contract before it is made and be a party to the contract, and do they supervise?

Mr. KEATING. The board names the members of a conference committee. The conference committee looks into all the facts in relation to a certain occupation or industry, and as the result of that investigation reports a minimum wage to be paid to women in that industry. The minimum wage board provided for in this bill has the power to either accept or reject that finding, but can not change the finding. We will suppose the board fixed $8.50 a week as the minimum wage for women employed in the department stores as saleswomen; the minimum wage board can not make it $8 or $9 a week, but might reject the report and appoint a new conference made up as the first conference was. In case of acceptance the board would be charged with the duty of seeing to it that the finding was enforced.

Mr. FESS. The acceptance of the board would make it a contract enforcible under the law, and any refusal to respect the contract will be subject to a penalty fixed in the law?

Mr. KEATING. The penalty is provided here. Any employer violating the law would be subject to penalty.

Mr. FESS. Does the gentleman say we have already such laws in some of the States?

Mr. KEATING. You have such laws in 12 States, namely, Arizona, Arkansas, California, Colorado, Kansas, Massachusetts, Minnesota, Nebraska, Oregon, Utah, Washington, and Wisconsin. They are not identical by any means, but they are all along the same general lines. The Oregon law was the one that attracted most attention and was finally carried to the Supreme Court of the United States. Massachusetts has proceeded along these same general lines, but in the Massachusetts law there is no penalty for the violation of the decrees of the minimum-wage board. We place the penalty here so that the finding may be enforced. It may interest the House to know that according to the very best authorities a majority of the women in industry are working for less than a living wage. It is estimated by those who have gone into the subject that between 50 and 60 per cent of the women who work day in and day out are drawing less than a living wage, and the conditions found here in the District of Columbia were quite as bad as those developed elsewhere. The investigators of the Bureau of Labor Statistics found that almost one-half of the 600 women workers interviewed and questioned as to their income and expenditures earn less than $8 per week. Over two-thirds earned less than $10 a week.

This low wage was not owing to their youth and inexperience—

Says the report of the committee—for 72 per cent were 21 years of age or older, and one-half of those earning less than $9 per week had been at work for five years and more.

So the necessity for the enactment of this kind of a law here in the District of Columbia has been amply demonstrated by a thorough investigation conducted by authority of Congress. The legality of the law is sustained by the Supreme Court of the United States, and the sufficiency of the remedy is demonstrated by the experience of a number of States.

Mr. FESS. One more question, if the gentleman will permit. Does the law apply to the people working in the District of Columbia as disassociated from those working for the Government?

Mr. KEATING. Those in Government employ are not affected.

Mr. REED. In the occupations investigated I want to know if the women engaged in domestic service in the District of Columbia were included in the investigation?

Mr. KEATING. I can not state offhand. It was a general investigation, however, and an endeavor was made to cover all occupations.

Mr. REED. Does not the gentleman think that on page 6, lines 12 and 13, where in referring to the standard of minimum wages for "women in any occupation," that that language would include practically any occupation where women were employed, domestic service as well as other service?

Mr. KEATING. Yes. As I stated in answer to another inquiry, I think under this law, if the board saw fit, it might deal with the wages of domestic servants.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Colorado has expired.

Mr. HILLIARD. I yield to the gentleman two minutes more.

Mr. COX. I would like to ask the gentleman about how many women in the District this would affect now, according to the hearings before the committee?

Mr. KEATING. I do not think the number of women affected has been secured. It is possible the chairman of the subcommittee might be able to give you the information.

Mr. COX. I did not know but probably a census had been taken.

Mr. KEATING. It is possible the figures have been put in.

Mr. COX. Was there anything before the committee as to how many minors would be affected by it?

Mr. KEATING. No. I do not think we had those figures. My impression is that the only figures available are those secured from the last census.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. If a woman is not satisfied with the wages she is receiving here in the department stores, say, would this law permit her to apply to the commissioners?

Mr. KEATING. The commissioners would have no power to regulate an individual's wages in the sense that if a woman were dissatisfied she might go to the commissioners and say, "I do not think I am getting a sufficient wage, and will you please see to it I get more?" There is nothing of that kind contemplated in this law.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. How is it going to protect a single woman?

Mr. KEATING. It would have to be taken up as an occupation or industry, and all the women engaged in that industry would have to be considered and the minimum wage would be fixed for all women in that industry.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. Then all the women, or a sufficient number, would have to petition?

Mr. KEATING. In all probability when this legislation is enacted the first thing to be done would be to take up the condition in the department stores.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. Suppose the women would not ask for it, would the commission take it up?

Mr. KEATING. The commission might proceed without being requested, but, as a rule, these minimum-wage commissioners will be kept busy taking care of petitions from the various industries. And this fact has been demonstrated, beyond the shadow of a doubt, that it has brought employer and employee together. When they sit around the table and discuss conditions in an industry, it does not take very long to ascertain what the minimum wage should be in that industry.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. May I ask one more question?

Mr. KEATING. And in none of these States have they had very serious difficulty.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Colorado has expired.

Mr. HILLIARD. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I used?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has used 27 minutes.

Mr. HILLIARD. I would like the gentleman from Wisconsin to use some of his time.

Mr. CARY. I would like to get recognition in my own right.

Mr. HILLIARD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the rest of my time.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will that cut off others who desire to speak on this bill?

Mr. CARY. I am not opposed to the bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. There is no limit of time in general debate. Anybody can get recognition for an hour before general debate is closed.

Mr. CARY. I will yield to gentlemen on this side. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I am most heartily in favor of this bill. It is a step in the right direction, and one that we ought to have taken, in my judgment, long ago; a step that really ought to have been taken first in the District of Columbia. Instead of that, we have let a number of States get ahead of us, and, as the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING] has very well stated, so far as any report that I can get from any of the various States that have adopted it shows, it has proved highly successful and of great benefit in the States.

In the brief time that is allotted to me I wish to say only a few words with reference to the general proposition which is involved in the bill. The old doctrine of laissez faire has, I am glad to say, become almost obsolete. Even in England, where it originated, it has been repudiated. England has seen the effect of this theory in the deterioration of the physical and moral well-being of its workers. They found when they got into war that the physical condition of the average English workingman was far below what it ought to be, far below what the public had the right to expect, and far below what it might have been had proper care been taken of them in the way of general law. By her old-age pension law and other remedial measures England has shown that she no longer intends that the welfare of her workingmen shall be permitted, like the price of commodities, to be governed solely by the law of supply and demand.

There is one feature of laws of this kind in regard to which I wish to speak most particularly. Gentlemen have noticed from the report that accompanies the bill that, far from being opposed to the bill, the Merchants and Manufacturers' Association of this city have come to its support. They have a reason for this, and a very excellent reason. I believe that the average employer wants to treat his employees fairly and wishes to give them a proper and a living wage, but as long as there are some in competition with him who do not, who wish to grind down their employees to the last cent and care nothing about their well-being, either morally or physically, he is then forced by competition to pay the same wages that they pay and drag his employees down to the same level, although this may be the last thing that he desires.

Now, by reason of this bill, if wages are fairly adjusted all over the District, every employer then can pay a fair and living wage. If he is not willing to do that, he will be compelled to do so, and those who have all the time desired to do that will be able to do so and meet competition on his part.

So far as the public is concerned, I do not believe that it will cost the public anything; but if it did cost the public anything the public ought to, and I believe will gladly, pay the expense. The reason why I believe it will not cost the public anything is because I think that those who are mean enough to mistreat their employees in the matter of wages, to grind them, as I said, down to the last cent for which they could obtain their labor, owing to the conditions which they had to meet—parties that will do this will, if possible, put into their own pockets whatever they are able to sweat from the brows of those that work for them. Consequently, although the sweat shop is created with all its evils, the public pays no less for its products, unless they are of inferior quality.

This bill is necessary, because those who apply for employment can not have the matter determined on the basis of fairness or the returns which they will give for the pay which is granted them. They are often compelled to take whatever the employer offers them. They do not deal on equal terms with the employer. He is, as a rule, in a position to dictate the terms of the agreement, to say what he will pay and no more. The employees, as a rule, have no option. Having no independent means, they must work to make a living. All the time there stares them in the face the necessity of obtaining bread and butter for the morrow, and if they can not obtain it at the desired wage they must take that which they can get, whatever it may be and however low it may fall. The inevitable consequences have been shown, not only in England, as I said, but also in our own country. A wage upon which the employee can not live in decency and in some degree of comfort inevitably tends to lower not only the physical standard, but the moral standard.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. COX. Why not extend it to men as well as women?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I know of no objection to that; but in these matters we are compelled sometimes to move only a step at a time, and perhaps it is best in some of these matters that we should move slowly. But I spoke somewhat inadvertently when I said there was no reason why it should not be extended to men. I will qualify that and say there is a greater reason for extending it to the case of women and children.

Mr. COX. I think that is true.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. There are not so many avenues of employment open to them; they have not so many opportunities to look about and make a choice and to refuse if the proper wage is not offered to them.

Mr. COX. I think the gentleman states the case well, but I can not see any valid reason why it should not be extended to men. Let me ask the gentleman another question for information. I have not looked into this question very much. Reference has been made to the States that have enacted laws on this question, as set out in the report. Do those laws apply only to women or to women and men?

Mr. HILLIARD. They apply only to women and children.

Mr. COX. Is that stated in the report as to the States that have enacted this legislation?

Mr. HILLIARD. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Section 17 requires that no appeal shall be taken from the decision of the board on any such question of fact. It is hard to tell how far that goes. Does the gentleman think there will be no appeal from the wages set by the board, either to make the wage higher or lower?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. No; I should not think so. I was not aware that this bill was coming up to-day. Consequently I have not studied it as carefully as I would have studied it if I had known it was to be made the order for to-day; but my offhand opinion as a lawyer would be that appeals would not be absolutely concluded in that way, because the question of the wage would be a mixed question of law and fact.

Mr. LONGWORTH. It is possible that it might be a mixed question, but not necessarily.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Not necessarily.

Mr. LONGWORTH. And if you enact a law providing that no appeal shall be taken from the board on any question of fact, I think it is going a little too far. I think the court on appeal ought to be able to consider questions both of law and of fact as to conclusions reached and wages fixed by the board.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I hardly think the court would be as well qualified to determine a question which was purely one of fact as the board would be, which is expected to make a special study of all these questions and make its findings from a somewhat broader view of the situation than the court would take as to questions of fact. The questions of law, of course, should be left to the court. At this time, speaking without mature deliberation, which might change my view, my opinion is that the question of what would be a living wage would be a question of fact only, but that regulations to enforce the payment thereof would involve legal questions.

Mr. ROSE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. ROSE. Does not the gentleman think the result of the hearings of this board will make the wages in the District of Columbia higher than anywhere else in this country? I notice by the papers that the cost of living in the District of Columbia is from 30 to 40 per cent higher than at any other place in this country.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. That may be the result, but that does not alter my desire to see the bill become a law.

Mr. ROSE. I agree with the gentleman in that this bill in many of its provisions should be enacted into law.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. While I think it is possible that that will be the result, I do not think it ought to be the result. I think this Congress ought to do something to regulate the cost of living in the District of Columbia. There is no reason why it should be so much higher than elsewhere, except that profiteering is rampant. Incidentally I will say that I have in my pocket a list of prices of articles of necessity, published in my own town, and if it would not take too much of the time of the committee I should like to call attention to the items of that list, showing that prices there are from 20 to 50 per cent less than here, especially on meats, when there ought to be very little difference in the prices there and in this town. I hope that question will engage the attention of the proper board in this city at some time in the near future. It is a matter in which we are not only interested personally, but we are interested on behalf of all the people of the city.

Mr. REED. Will the gentleman yield for a question about the bill?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. REED. The author of the bill stated that the board would evidently be kept very busy. The act provides that the members of the board are to receive no salary for their services. Does the gentleman believe we can always have an efficient board in view of that fact, and that it will be imbued with enough of the spirit of altruism to enable it to perform intelligently this service at all times?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I think so, on a matter of this kind. We have perhaps sometimes underrated the patriotism of the people of this country. In England they have boards and high commissions whose members, as a rule, receive no salaries whatever, although their duties may take all the time of men of high standing and important business connections. I believe the same thing could be done in this country, especially in a matter of this kind, which would very naturally excite the sympathy and altruistic spirit of those engaged in it. I believe the proper persons can be obtained to carry on the business of the board without any salaries. If salaries were appended to these positions I think naturally it would somewhat tend to lower their real standing. I would like to see those on the board serve without compensation, unless indeed it became necessary in order that the working people should have a proper representation upon the board.

Just one minute more. I am very glad to see this bill come before the House with the unanimous support of the committee on the affairs of the District, and I commend them most heartily for their action. There is no work more needed, no duty more pressing upon us at this time, than to see that in this great crisis of affairs the physical and moral welfare of the working people is taken care of so far as the exigencies of the occasion will admit, and I earnestly support the bill for that reason. [Applause.]

Mr. CARY. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I commend the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING] for having introduced this bill, and I think he misunderstood the questions I put to him a little while ago about one or two phases of it. To me it seems to be entirely unnecessary and gratuitous to include in the title of the bill or in the body of the bill a suggestion that it is an attempt to regulate the morals of women who have to work. That seems to be an unfair and unnecessary reflection upon those who are less favored in this world than some of their wealthier sisters. The title sets out that the bill is to protect the lives, health, and morals of women and minor workers. It would be quite sufficient to say that it is a bill to protect the lives and health of women and minor workers and leave out the question of morals altogether, because that is a matter that can not well be regulated by law.

Mr. REED. Would the gentleman substitute "social conditions," or something of that kind, which would be a milder term?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I do not like that, either, because I do not like the suggestion that because women are obliged to work therefore you must legislate with respect to their morals or their personal rights.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Does the gentleman doubt that the necessity for protecting the lives and health of the women is a sufficient justification for the law without any regard to the question of morals?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I think it is quite sufficient to say that the bill is intended to protect the lives and the health of women and minor workers in the District of Columbia.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Is not that of itself sufficient to justify the legislation?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I think so.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Right in that connection, if I am not trespassing too much on the gentleman's time, section 9 provides that this board is authorized to ascertain and declare standards of wages and what wages are inadequate to protect the morals of women.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That implies an inquiry by the board which, I presume, would be sufficient.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Right in that connection, the bill provides that this conference shall be called, and is not that in and of itself almost an indictment of the morals of the class of employees into which they are inquiring?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I should think so.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. It seems so to me.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I do not know how far I shall carry my opposition to the bill on that ground. I am inclined to favor the purpose of the bill. I think the purpose is commendable, and I have commended the gentleman from Colorado, who is generally active in these matters, for having introduced the bill, but he has followed blindly the act of the Legislature of the State of Oregon. My contention is that the Congress of the United States ought to be sufficiently big of itself to originate legislation of this kind without necessarily following the language of the Oregon Legislature.

Mr. KEATING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. KEATING. The gentleman recognizes that it is desirable, where it is possible to do it, to adopt the language which has been construed by the courts. At least, that seems to be the opinion of competent attorneys. I want to say to the gentleman that I am in complete accord with the position he has taken, and I will readily join with the gentleman in eliminating anything from the bill which can be construed in any way as a reflection upon the morals of those who are to benefit from this legislation, because that was not the intent of those who drafted it. The sole purpose of placing the language in the bill was to bring it within the decision of the Supreme Court, and the courts have held that Oregon has the power to enact legislation for the purpose set forth in the title of the bill, and those interested in the bill felt that we ought to adhere to the language and not take a chance that the Supreme Court might change its mind.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am pleased the gentleman from Colorado has made that statement, and I want to say just this, that inasmuch as this bill now, if it goes through, which I presume it will, will be sanctioned by the Congress of the United States and held up as a model to all the States of the Union, in addition to Oregon, it might be well for the Congress to exercise a little discretion in regard to the language, as well as the effect of the bill. Apart from the question of morals, which we have discussed sufficiently, I want to call attention to section 2 and say that I can not quite agree with the language in that section. We do not want to pass legislation in Congress that will be a reflection upon the morals of the working people. Neither would we want to pass legislation here which would sanction the calling of one part of our people a class as distinguished from another part of our people. But section 2 does this very unusual thing of defining classes, something I do not approve of in any sense. The gentleman from Colorado in his argument made a little while ago said that one of the advantages of this bill would be that it would group around the council table employers and employees, and that they would get to know each other better.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. CARY. I yield to the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And to that argument of the gentleman from Colorado I subscribe most heartily. But take section 2 as presented, it is provided that when you come to make up this minimum wage board, one of the members shall represent the interest of the employing class. Now, the word "class" is unnecessary in this connection, because the use of it, rather than tending to bring the elements together, would tend to separate them at once. It goes on further to say, "and the other shall be one of the interests of the employed class." Again, I say that that word is out of place. It separates the very people we want to bring together.

When we come to the second section I intend to offer an amendment striking out the word "class," because I think it is unnecessary and dangerous. Rather than help to bring the elements together around the council table, as suggested by the gentleman from Colorado, it will have a reverse tendency. This great country of ours is not a country of classes.

Mr. REED. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. REED. Might not one of these women employed at good wages in a department be an employer herself of labor at home and thereby in both classes?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is very likely to happen. I venture to say that there are thousands of women in the District of Columbia obtaining relatively high wages as Government employees who go home and give orders themselves to those they employ. It would be very harsh of the law to say that a woman who is employed in Government service belongs to one class and the woman who does the household work to another class and the employer in a third class. It is un-American.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. FESS. The gentleman would not object if you should say "one as the representative of the employers and the other as the representative of the employees."

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. No; that it what I was going to suggest.

Mr. FESS. We have in recent legislation done just that thing.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. When we come to it, I shall offer an amendment which will eliminate the word "class."

I want to illustrate. Workmen employed in the industries who are vital to the prosecution of the war do not like to be called servants, neither do they like to recognize those who employ them as "masters." For a long time the word "master" was applied to various associations of employers, but it became repugnant to those who were employed, and gradually the word "master" was eliminated from the titles of such associations. These words as applied to employers and employees have gone out in modern nomenclature, although the terms "master and servant" are still technically familiar to you gentlemen of the bar. "Master and servant" are no longer American terms. They are entirely foreign to the Government of the United States, which is now contending for a world democracy. "Master" and "servant" and "class" are terms belonging to the feudal age. They are too aristocratic for a democratic Republic. I trust that when the time comes the gentlemen who brought in the bill will consent to have the word "class" stricken out.

I also hope the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING] will not misunderstand the questions I put to him a little while ago. They were put in good faith and tended to show, as his statement since made tends to show, the wisdom of a little discussion of bills of this kind. I have no purpose to carp over the bill and every desire to pass it, so far as the main purpose of it is concerned.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has again expired.

Mr. ROSE. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. CARY. I yield two minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. ROSE. Mr. Chairman, recurring to the former discussion in respect to the word "morals" is it not generally believed that the low wages usually paid to girls has a tendency to their immorality.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I think that impression has been spread broadcast.

Mr. ROSE. I would like to see that impression blotted out.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. We have had numerous uplift societies, which in their reports convey that impression; but I would ask the gentleman if he thinks there is any more immorality among the poor than among the rich. That is the long and the short of it.

Mr. ROSE. I do not, but I always have thought that has been the general belief; that the wages paid to girls should be higher, in order to protect their morals; and I thought that was what this committee had in mind when they presented this bill.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. We will grant all that; but I will ask again, if the well-dressed girl is any more likely to be moral than the poorly dressed girl?

Mr ROSE. Not in my judgment.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Then why raise the question at all?

Mr. ROSE. I am satisfied that it should be eliminated.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I think it should go out of the bill. We are dealing with the question of wages and working conditions, and why drag in the question of morality in a way that reflects upon those who, in this instance, happen to be working people.

Mr. ROSE. It surely was never intended as a reflection of that kind.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am satisfied of that, since the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING] made his statement. I am satisfied that was not the purpose in using the phrase in this bill, and I trust the gentlemen will consent to have it go out.

Mr. ROSE. I am in hopes that the gentleman's remarks will result in having the word eliminated from the bill.

Mr. CARY. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS].

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, the question of minimum wage is one in which I have been interested for a good many years. I recognize the basis upon which the claim is made and fully appreciate it. I also recognize the difficulty of administering such a law without doing some injustice both to the one employed as well as to those who employ. The matter came up in Ohio in 1912 in the constitutional convention of which I was a member. It was thoroughly gone into, and after having given it sympathetic study I came to the conclusion that we ought to write in the constitution the sanction for the legislature to pass laws fixing a minimum wage if the legislature could find a basis of operation which would make such a law justifiable. That was in 1912. The legislature, so far as individual members interest go, has had the matter up at different times, but up to the present time have never been able to work out a minimum wage law in our State which was sufficiently grounded to win the support of the legislature. To-day we have no such a law in the State, not primarily because there is opposition to it but because of the difficulty in working it out. From the nature of such legislation it can not be made workable in a large State in which such great variety of conditions exist where labor can not be made uniform throughout the State. So that the question of the minimum wage is not to me one of incidental or fugitive interest since it is one to which I have given a good deal of study. I think that this proposed law removes a good deal of the difficulty in administration by virtue of the fact that you are creating a board to sit upon the individual cases covering classes of employment and to make recommendations which have the force of law to which there is a penalty attached for its violation. This permits a variation in wage not only in classes of employment but localities, if not degrees of efficiency, all of which should be considered. That cures in a marked degree the difficulty that has always appealed to me when you come to make a general minimum law by which you say that a person shall not be employed at a less wage than a certain fixed amount. That has always been a stumbling block to me. It virtully eliminates the main qualifications which are sought by an employer, which makes one man or woman acceptable and another not, and which supply most of the enthusiasm of a workman.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. CANNON. I misunderstand the gentleman, I take it. This board that is proposed here will deal with individual cases?

Mr. FESS. It will deal not with individual cases, speaking of the employee, but it will with individual cases, speaking of the employer.

Mr. CANNON. For employment?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. I would like to ask the gentleman: In many cases, especially about the universities and running around the high schools and frequently running around the common schools, people who are not able to get education but get their board or clothing or both, and sometimes some charity mixed with it, have certain employment. Would employment of that kind come under the terms expressed in this law?

Mr. FESS. I am not sufficiently acquainted with the requirements of the law to answer either affirmatively or negatively. The bill includes business, industry, trade, or any branch thereof.

Mr. CANNON. It seems to me it would not. It speaks of occupations. I think it would be an occupation if you take domestic duties. That would be an occupation although you board the party, perhaps board and clothe him?

Mr. FESS. Make that part of the wage.

Mr. CANNON. Precisely. I do not know, I am not opposing the policy of enacting that legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CARY. I yield the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. FESS. I would say to my friend from Illinois that I have never had any sympathy with the suggestion that we make a law forbidding the individual to take less than a certain figure if he wanted to do so. I realize that the purpose of minimum wage legislation is to deal with the factory system and with groups of labor involved by modern industrialism, and with and for the sake of that class I have a great deal of sympathy with the agitation; but for me to vote for a law declaring that you nor I should be permitted to work for a less figure than is fixed in the law, no matter what may be my wish or circumstance, that is, without consulting my own position but simply because it is declared against public policy, and therefore the law, to work for a less figure, I have no sympathy with that sort of an argument or statement at all. Speaking individually, I know the road that one has to travel who has had to work his way through life. I know very distinctly if I had had to wait for employment until I could get a certain figure I would have gone without the means of advancement and would have become a subject of public charity. There is ample proof all about us what willingness to work for what service will command will bring in the end. In all probability most of us would have had no employment many times when we would have been glad to have been employed for what we could get if such a principle had been in vogue in our day. The basis of this legislation is, every worker who has nothing to sell except his labor should be paid a sufficient wage upon which he can live. That appears a humane and justifiable theory for which we should strive. But it should be economic rather than legal. The country owes that to him, and I have a great deal of sympathy for such a principle, but doubt its efficacy in statutory enactment. It must result from our industrial life that every person who has only his labor to sell should have a claim upon somebody to be employed at a wage upon which he can live. The proponents of this legislation demand this standard written into law, and while I admit that there is a great deal of sympathy in my make-up as to that, yet at the same time it is a question with me whether the Government owes me a living in the strict sense of the term, rather than I owe it to myself. It is rather a question whether I am worth what I can make and nothing more. Some people say they are worth so much whether they work or not—the Government owes it to them. I do not share with that view at all. I am worth what my ability will be able to command, and I do not believe in this artificial price fixing in legislation which says you are worth so much no matter whether your service commands it or not. I have no sympathy with that.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. I will yield to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Having in mind what the gentleman says about the basic principle upon which this sort of legislation is supposed to be based, can the gentleman see the obligation on the part of society to furnish what is called a living wage attaches to any one form of labor more than another?

Mr. FESS. I can not.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Then, if this is sound, this principle must be extended to every form of labor?

Mr. FESS. Most certainly it must.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I am glad the gentleman agrees with me.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield for a suggestion on my own part?

Mr. FESS. I will.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. It seems to me this kind of a law is based on the principle that the parties do not deal on terms of equality. If that be the case there may be certain conditions of sex and difference of age which would make the ratio of inequality greater and the necessity for the application of the law greater in certain instances. It has here been applied only to women and children, where it seems to me the necessity is greater. I think also there may be certain occupations in which the necessity will not arise, or the inequality might possibly be shifted from one side to the other, so that in certain instances it may be the employee actually had the advantage of the employer instead of the employer having the advantage of the employee. Therefore, if my friend will pardon me, I take a different view from what I inferred was taken by the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. FESS. I think in legislation of this sort you ought not to discriminate. I have always opposed any legislation that sets out this or that class. That is one reason why I was originally opposed to what we call the Clayton bill——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. FESS. May I have two minutes?

Mr. CARY. I yield two minutes additional to the gentleman.

Mr. FESS. I did not join with the membership of this House, and the membership was in a large majority, in the Clayton antitrust bill which would permit the prosecution of certain people for violating a certain law and exempt certain other people or classes of people for violating the same law. Such legislation is not only un-American, but it is vicious in its possibilities.

I think that is one of the most dangerous things that this or any other Government can ever enter upon in the form of legislation. For just as certainly as we are here, if we are willing to discriminate in favor of one class as against another in our legislation we must see the day come when that is opening up the way to be discriminated against in due time. And I think it is extremely dangerous that that particular legislation seemed quite popular.

That leads me to make this observation. I just take time to say that that sort of legislation which divides the citizenry of our country into groups is, in my judgment, basically unsound and fundamentally undemocratic, and we ought to studiously avoid it. If I may say so, that is the greatest danger which to-day confronts our American electorate, where you vote in groups and where you do not consider or consult the individual but consult simply the leader. Then the leader will have the ability, because of his influence as head of the group, to say to you, "You do this or I will do that," and so on. His vote is not one, but may be a thousand, or enough to be decisive, when group interest and not the larger public interest rules. That is a serious situation that confronts a democracy. It is legislating for one group as against another group, and is therefore discrimination, in violation of the principle that in a democracy all are equal under the law. In the interest of such principle and for that reason our legislation ought to be uniform. And, secondly, referring to what my friend from Pennsylvania said on the moral side, I fully agree that we do not want to enact any law that would be a reflection or an invitation to a sort of insult from one class as against another. But everybody will recognize that while moral legislation can not take place in this House upon moral grounds primarily, yet if you can find a civil reason for it and make that the basis of it, moral legislation is always legitimate, of course. As I said in the onset, this proposed bill does not fix a minimum wage. It does, however, create a board to consider all cases with reference to a minimum wage. It will operate as an intermediary body between employer and employee, an arbitration board, as it were, and find its decisions upon the facts of each case considered. I am therefore glad to give it my support.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, this is an important bill and a good bill, and I think there should be a quorum here to listen to the discussion. I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma). The gentleman from New York makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. Evidently there is no quorum present. The Clerk will call the roll.

Thereupon the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 12098) to protect the lives and health and morals of women and minor workers in the District of Columbia, and to establish a minimum-wage board, and define its powers and duties, and to provide for the fixing of minimum wages for such workers, and for other purposes, and finding itself without a quorum, he had directed the roll to be called, whereupon 220 Members—a quorum—had answered to their names, and he submitted a list of absentees for printing in the Journal.

The SPEAKER. The committee will resume its sitting.

The committee resumed its sitting.

Mr. CARY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, it is easier to write the title of a bill like this than to write the body of the law that makes it enforceable.

A great question is raised here—that of a living wage. That has been a question through all the ages, and one in which society has never taken a sufficiently intelligent and serious interest. Society can well afford to take enough interest in a matter of this kind to do what is necessary to maintain a minimum wage throughout the entire body of society. It can not be done in selected or particular localities. The minimum wage can not be maintained above the minimum wage paid in near-by or competing communities or counties. In order to maintain, therefore, a living wage, a minimum wage, it is necessary to apply conditions throughout the body of society that will pay that minimum wage. In order to do that, many things must be taken into account. The product produced by the wage earner, the extent to which it is produced in competitive communities, the price that the product brings upon the market, must be taken into account in order to fix and maintain that wage.

I can see how sporadic cases here and there, where the wage does not depend upon the sale of a product that is produced by the wage earner, might be maintained at a higher minimum for a time than is paid to wage earners similarly employed elsewhere. I am speaking now of the fundamental principle underlying this great economic and sociological question. To maintain it there must be a minimum wage below which no employer employs labor at a lower rate of pay than the minimum wage paid in adjacent communities, or in countries where the product of labor similarly employed has access to the same market. If the District of Columbia, that is not an industrial community and has no industries of any consequence in which laborers are employed, fixes a minimum wage for Government clerks and salesmen in stores—and they should be named—and for domestic servants—and they should be so named if they are to be within the scope of the law—that condition may be maintained here in the District of Columbia for a time. But under the title of the act and under the body of the law proposed one is led to believe that it applies to industries that produce products that are offered upon the market for sale. Mr. Chairman, such products will be sold at the lowest price they can be sold for, or must be sold for, in order to be sold at all by the producer; the lowest price they can be sold for and give the employer of wage earners a sufficient profit on his industry to keep it running and pay the wages of the employees; and, second, that being out of the way, then the other question comes in—to enable him to sell his product, notwithstanding the fact that similar products, produced by labor similarly employed elsewhere, are sold upon equal terms in the same market in which he sells his product. These questions do not arise in the District of Columbia, but they are applicable when a minimum wage is considered for the entire body of society, with a view of raising the minimum wage throughout the world; because the products of the world from now on more than ever before will find their way into every accessible market. One of the great problems that immediately confronts the world to-day is the readjustment of society and of sociological conditions, so that, let us all hope, there will be a leveling up of mankind. It will take a high order of statesmanship to do this. It can not be done by denunciation and resolution.

Mr. LONDON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. LONDON. Would not the thought of the gentleman be better served by the expression "elevating the masses" instead of "leveling up"?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I do not object to the expression "elevating the masses."

Mr. LONDON. I thought that was what was in the gentleman's mind.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes. I want to see the people of the whole world brought to the highest level that we have in the United States, and I want to see the lowest in the United States brought up to the highest level we have here. If that is done, I shall have no concern whether we have laws that by taxation bar the products of one part of the world from entering the markets of another section of the world on equal terms or not. If labor throughout the world is paid a similar wage, equal to the highest for producing a like product, then we can maintain a minimum wage throughout the world, and we can not maintain it until then.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman believe that this problem of leveling up or elevating the masses is merely a financial problem?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. No; but it is a wage problem in a very large sense. After the employee is paid a wage of sufficient amount it will take him even then some time to get out of the atmosphere in which he has lived. For instance, the lowest paid laborer in the world has lived in an atmosphere in which the use and value of money is not fully appreciated, and it is doubtful if a high wage would have the desired effect on the laborer in one generation.

Mr. WALSH. If that be true, then the minimum living wage would be the same minimum for all classes and all industries, would it not?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. It ought to be the same for those similarly employed, but even then it is difficult to attain that result desired. It ought to be done if it can be. That is why I say this is a very great question, and that it is easier to write the title of this bill than it is to write the body of the law that makes the idea expressed in the title enforcible.

Mr. WALSH. My question was prompted by the statement of the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING] that all employees should be paid a living wage. Now, if that is the minimum, it ought not to cost a man who works at sweeping the street any more to live than it does the floor walker in a department store, or a person engaged in an office. Is not that so?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I leave that to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING]. I am not a sociologist in the sense that the gentleman's question would compliment me with being.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. May I have a minute or two more?

Mr. CARY. I yield to the gentleman two minutes. How much more time have I?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has 15 minutes remaining.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I am deeply interested in this question. I do not believe this is even a beginning of its solution. This bill simply raises the question in the minds of men who have given the subject consideration. This law, having a local application, should be specific in its terms. It should name the employers and employees to be affected by it. This is a community in which there are no great industries employing numbers of people. There are no great factories here. If it is desirable to pass a law of this kind for a local community such as this, it should state in the body of the law just what is intended to be done, because a general minimum-wage law is not applicable to this community.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. With the great decrease in the purchasing power of money or the great increase in the cost of living under war conditions, if you pass a law saying what the minimum wage shall be, and, lo and behold, the price of money should increase or the cost of living should decrease, would it not keep you pretty busy passing laws?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Raising or lowering the minimum?

Mr. CANNON. The minimum to-day might be $2, and yet 24 months from now $2 might buy twice as much as it would to-day, perhaps.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Then you would lower the minimum wage.

Mr. CANNON. I am thinking about the difficulty of passing a law every time that the weather changes.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. As I said in the beginning, it is easier to write the title of a law of this kind than it is to write the body of the law. Until all countries agree on the same general minimum wage for labor similarly employed, each country will have to take such action as is necessary to establish and maintain its own standard of wages and living.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. HILLIARD. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON].

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, whether we want it or not, the parliaments of the world are compelled to legislate on industrial matters. I do not believe that a successful minimum-wage law which would gratify all the aspirations of the laboring masses can be adopted under existing conditions even on a national scale. What interests me and what I welcome is the effort of the Legislature to grapple with the problem. The District of Columbia has no industries. The only substantial employers of labor are, first, the Government, the salaries of whose employees are determined by statute, and next the large department stores. So that it is comparatively easy to legislate in the direction of a minimum-wage law for the employees in the District of Columbia. This bill as drawn is rather elastic. There is nothing rigorous about it. It can not be rigorous. It provides for the appointment of commissioners. It provides for conferences between employers and employees, and the most valuable provision of the bill probably is the conference feature. Employers and employees coming together will be able to present their respective claims as to what particular wage should be paid at a particular time.

When the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] objected to the inclusion of the phrase "employing class" they were right to an extent, but not altogether. Whether you will refer to them as the representatives of the employers or of the employing class or the representatives of the employees or of the wage-working class, no matter what you call them, the law is compelled to recognize the existence of a conflict of interests in modern society between the employing class and those who are employed. It is true that these classes have not the character of a caste. It is true that it is possible for some individuals to transfer themselves by a special effort from the laboring class into the employing class, and these chances are growing fewer and fewer. But a former employee, when he becomes an employer, is very often a most unscrupulous employer of labor and a strong defender of his new interests and of the new class or group, or whatever you may call it, of which he has become a part. So the conflict is there, and the clash of interests is there. The legislator can not afford to close his eyes to the fact. Full light on the condition of the workers as well as full knowledge on the profits of the employers can be obtained only if employers and employees will face each other in conference and a commission will have access to the books of the employer. In some cases there seems to be absolutely no remedy except to eliminate certain employers from industry. The margin of profit is so small that they are compelled to pay starvation wages, and there is no remedy except to destroy that particular branch of industry.

Now, coming down to the fundamental question of a minimum wage, we find that there is a moral principle involved in it. What does a minimum wage mean? It means that no matter how humble an industry or occupation may be—whether it be that of the street cleaner, requiring no skill whatever, or that of the astronomer, studying the stars—one thing is certain, and that is that the human being should get sufficient compensation for his services to be able to live, and to live as a human being. He must have food, he must have clothing, he must have rent, and he must have an opportunity for education. These four elements must be supplied to the human being in any civilized community. Unless the wage paid the worker is sufficient to secure to him these four elements which go into the making of the life of a civilized human being, he can not live a man's life. The larger the number of men and women who work below such a minimum wage, the less stable is society.

The report of the Commission on Industrial Relations—shelved because of the advent of the war—disclosed a state of affairs in the United States which is absolutely shocking so far as compensation of a very large part of the workers of the country is concerned. The people of the United States have been prosperous, more prosperous than others.

They have lived a better life than other nations and their statesmen have become indolent. Here they had a continent large enough to support 500,000,000 people. The country was so young, energetic, full of vigor, that the statemen of America believed that the great industrial problems which were torturing Europe would never become serious in the United States. And because of the negligence of American statesmen the problem became more severe than it would have become had American intellect applied itself to the solution of the problem.

Many years ago the late Justice Brown, of the Supreme Court, pointed out to the young students of America the need of studying the great social problems that were being completely disregarded. We are just beginning to wake up. The English workers demand a minimum wage on a national scale. In other words, they demand that industrial society should be governed by the moral law, and all legislation, which is, after all, economic legislation, should be ruled by a moral law.

Consider the stupidity of some text-book writers who would apply the law of supply and demand to the relation of employer and employee. That is the survival of a doctrine that should find no place in modern society. Apply the doctrine of supply and demand to the relation of human beings and see what an absurdity you will come to. See what a state of cruelty you will reach. What will it mean to apply the so-called law of supply and demand to the returning soldiers, to millions of men coming back from the battle fields? Political economists will say to them, "The law of supply and demand is working now. There are only 500 jobs and there are millions of you, and you are invited to work for nothing." That is the law of supply and demand. These psuedoscientists would continue forever to govern the relations between human beings as the relations between capital and labor are governed now. Capital and labor are but abstractions. It is the relation between man and man that should interest us. When you speak of human society you speak of the relation of man to man. The relations between man and man can not be permitted to be governed by a law which is supposed to control the price of potatoes.

We will have to revise our conception of the law of supply and demand, and if we revise it and apply a moral process to our economic laws and to our legislation, which is based on economic laws, we will find that the beginning of the thing is the minimum wage. In other words, we will say to the employers: "Below that we shall not permit you to go." We will say to the worker: "We shall not permit you to sink, even if you are inclined so to do." A moral law applied to society—that is the basis of minimum wage legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the gentleman to yield me some more time.

Mr. CARY. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. LONDON. We are now undoubtedly beginning to realize the importance of this legislation.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONDON. Yes.

Mr. NOLAN. The gentleman referred to a condition that might exist after the war, whereby the law of supply and demand might be applied to men returning from the trenches. I would like to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that the Government to-day, for the purpose of stabilizing and standardizing wages and labor, is applying the principle not alone of the minimum wage, but they are making the minimum wage in the shipyards the maximum wage.

In other words, if the worker is to be told after he comes back from the trenches that the law of supply and demand ought to be good enough for him, he is told to-day that he is not going to get the benefit of that law. He can not take advantage of the law of supply and demand to-day, because the Government steps in and says that for the purpose of stabilizing labor and standardizing wages it is going to fix that wage, and below that they will not go and above that they will not permit one to go.

Mr. LONDON. As long as these iniquitous principles are practiced by employers, and they take advantage of the law of supply and demand, the same principle is practiced by labor. The result is chaos.

Mr. NOLAN. I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that this not alone applies to the workers in the employ of the Government, but it is being applied to contracts by private employers whereby there is a fixed wage, which is both minimum and maximum, and that the law of supply and demand in a day like this, where the worker would get the benefit of it, is denied to him.

Mr. LONDON. That is a perversion of the principle of the minimum wage. After all, no amount of legislation will help the man who would not help himself. If the workers do not understand how to organize and how to enforce their just demands, no one on earth can protect them. What is legislation, after all? You know that the lawyers are very conservative, and they are an obstruction to progress. You know that judges are even more conservative than lawyers, and they have to be pushed hard in order to move. When do we enact a law? When the moral force of the community makes it imperative, when it becomes irresistible. Then the lawyers come in and the legislators come in and say, "Oh, for years we have been thinking along that line. We have been intensely interested in these problems. Of course we are for the minimum-wage law"—the very same lawyer who only a few years ago insisted upon the sacredness of private contract, who argued that the law should not interfere with private arrangements, although there could be no talk of an arrangement where one was compelled by starvation to accept any terms that were offered to him. Can there be a question of contract when on one side you have a worker with a large family compelled to bring bread home and on the other hand you have an employer with inexhaustible resources? Is there any equality between the two, and could the theory of freedom of contract be applied in discussing their relations? But lawyers, with their lawyerlike minds, who whittle down an idea, who cut it down and trim it until there is nothing left of it—these fellows have always applied the doctrine of freedom of contract to the relations between man and man.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONDON. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman from New York is a pretty good lawyer, is he not?

Mr. LONDON. I admit that I am a good lawyer. [Laughter.] But I look upon the law as a living science, not as a religious dogma. I think that the law should express the awakening conscience of mankind, should anticipate new thought, should lead instead of being compelled to follow. I believe that the jurist, the student of law, should make a special study of the relations between man and man; should take nothing for granted; should not worship institutions simply because they are old; should scrutinize, analyze, examine, ask questions, be ready to march forward with events as life dictates. That is the mission of the lawyer—not merely to be the servant of a particular group, who happen to be strong in society, to help them crush the helpless; and, unfortunately, that is the function of a great majority of the lawyers who are in the service of the ruling interests. Industrial legislation is coming. All legislation will become industrial. When the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] expressed such horror in respect to the use of the expression "class," he forgot that the classes are here. By merely denying their existence you do not gain anything.

All legislation in the past has been class legislation. Does the gentleman not know that? What is the feudal system? It is the system of the landlord against the rest of the community. What were the early laws of this Republic when only the man who had property had the right to vote? The property owner as against the rest of the people.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has again expired.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the gentleman to yield for five minutes more.

Mr. CARY. I yield five minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. LONDON. Why is it that legislation has been class legislation?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I do not want the gentleman to forget the Constitution of the United States upon that point.

Mr. LONDON. I do not. The Constitution first of all represents a document written in 1787. I always bear that in mind. I never forget the calendar. This is 1918. Too many people forget the calendar. After all, when it comes to an interpretation of the Constitution, it will be interpreted in the light of to-day.

When we speak of classes in the United States, of course they have not that rigidity that they have in other countries and can not have it. The democratic instinct is too strong here. Democracy does not mean perfection, it means a chance to fight for improvement, and to the extent to which there is that chance just to that extent there is democracy. It will do no good to deny that there are evil influences, that we are blessed with a Lumber Trust, with a Steel Trust, and with arrogant financial interests. The greater the success of the democratic element in contending with these antidemocratic influences the more will democracy be a reality. Of course, I am using the word democracy in the broadest sense, and not in its narrow political sense. It is in the interest of this Republic, since this contest must go on, since for the very life of society this struggle must continue, that it be transferred as much as possible from the industrial field, with its strikes and lockouts, so that it may find expression in the parliamentary field, where legislators can speak for their districts and speak for the people, and reach a result which will serve the largest number of the people of the United States. [Applause.]

As a Socialist, instead of denying the existence of the class struggle, I seek to minimize its bitterness.

Mr. CARY. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. REED].

Mr. REED. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of legislation along the lines laid down in this bill. Its purpose is to relieve a great many worthy people in the District of Columbia who are not adequately remunerated for the work they perform. The bill does not attempt to definitely fix minimum wages, but it does create a board to whom employees may have recourse when they feel that they are not receiving proper compensation for the services they are performing.

The provisions of this bill, properly enforced, will not only benefit those who have their labor to sell, but will protect those who buy labor by placing each employer on an equal footing with all others who employ labor for similar commercial activities. I would like to see the bill amended in some particulars. I was very much interested in the suggestions of my learned and distinguished colleague from Pennsylvania. I fully agree with him that this act should carry no suggestion or intimation that it is legislation enacted primarily for safeguarding the morals of those who toil.

I am unwilling to attach to any legislation in the interest of labor here in the Capital of the world's greatest democracy the implication that there is more immorality among those who must work because they are poor than exists in the ranks of the opulent and well-to-do element of society.

Of the many laws recently passed by Congress having for their ultimate purpose the increase of salaries and wages I recall no instance, either in the titles of the acts or in the debates here on the floor of the House, where it was even hinted that such increases were made necessary because of any tendency toward moral retrogression on the part of the employees who were to be the beneficiaries.

I therefore sincerely hope this bill will not single out what I believe to be a most respectable class of America's workers and brand them with an unwarranted stigma. I want to see this legislation passed without delay, and I hope it can be so amended as to carry the idea that it is being enacted not to correct the morals of any class of workers, but to give a square deal to all who are oppressed and without means to protect themselves. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CARY. Mr. Chairman, this bill is not only advisable from a humanitarian and sentimental standpoint, but it is the consensus of opinion of sociologists, industrial experts, health commissioners, and practically everyone who in any way is called upon to study conditions of labor and living that some such legislation is absolutely necessary for the protection of women and children under modern industrial conditions. When the hearings were being held before the committee on this bill, it was significant that no one appeared in opposition to the bill. A remarkable circumstance which has probably never occurred in any previous legislative hearings on a measure affecting wage legislation in this country, was the appearance of the official organized body of employers—the Merchants and Manufacturers' Association of the District—who sent their representative to make a statement indorsing the bill and urging its passage. This association has a membership representing 33 different businesses in Washington—department stores are the largest employers, having in their establishments probably 5,000 persons. The enlightened and progressive position taken by the employers of the District who are directly affected by the measure has properly impressed the committee. Their approval means that such legislation is recognized as being based on sound business principles, because it makes for a more efficient and more contented labor force. It also protects the fair and enlightened employer from underbidding competitors.

Besides the indorsement of employers, approval of minimum-wage legislation comes to us from the workers through their organizations, and also through three representatives who appeared in person. Mr. KEATING, introducer of the bill, read into the record a resolution adopted by the Thirty-third Annual Convention of the American Federation of Labor. It discussed the principle of minimum-wage legislation for unprotected workers, especially women and children, and recommended that provision be made for the proper representation of wage earners on minimum-wage boards and that they be administered "so as to afford the largest measure of protection for women and minor workers."

The president of the Federal Employees' Union appeared to urge the passage of the bill. Two women workers of the national and local Women's Trade Union Leagues told of the need of this legislation from their own experiences as wage earners, and the manifold hardships of attempting to live on wages too low for proper subsistence.

The following excerpt from the report on the bill states briefly and concisely the reasons for reporting it and the need of the legislation:

"The proposed legislation is needed in the District of Columbia because conditions of employment in the laundries, department stores, and such manufacturing establishments as exist here are not materially different from conditions found to exist in other parts of the country. Investigation has shown that a substantial proportion of wage-earning girls and women in this country receive less than a living wage. The same is true here. The Federal Bureau of Labor Statistics has recently published the results of an investigation into the cost of living in the District. Almost one-half (46 per cent) of the 600 women workers interviewed and questioned as to their income and expenditures earned less than $8 per week. Nearly two-thirds (64 per cent) earned less than $10 per week.

"This low wage was not owing to their youth and inexperience, for 72 per cent were 21 years of age or older, and one-half of those earning less than $9 per week had been at work for five years and more.

"In connection with these figures we must consider the actual cost of board and lodging in the District to-day. Owing to the abnormal conditions of war times these costs have risen greatly, even during the past few months. In 1917 the Federal Bureau of Labor Statistics stated that $6 a week was the 'bare minimum' upon which the average woman could obtain board and lodging in Washington. A year later information presented at the hearing on this bill showed that according to the room registration office of the local council of national defense the minimum expense at which a woman can now find board and lodging is $35 per month; that is over $8 per week. That means accommodation for two in a room, and very few rooms can be found at that rate.

"The difficulties of obtaining adequate clothing even with the strictest economy upon the present wages received were brought out by the investigation of the Bureau of Labor Statistics. In 1915 a State commission in New York estimated the 'barest minimum for decent clothing' for a woman to be $88 per year. Two years later nearly half—42 per cent—of the 600 women wage earners interviewed in Washington spent less than that minimum on clothing, in spite of the increased cost of materials. In 1917, according to the Bureau of Labor Statistics, a working woman in Washington to be 'well but not extravagantly dressed,' must spend approximately $125 per year. More than two-thirds—68 per cent—of the women interviewed spent less than that amount. In the lowest income groups 'the average expenditure for every item of clothing is below that which would permit of physical comfort and decency.'

"Dr. W. C. Woodward, health commissioner of the District of Columbia, pointed out at the hearing that in his opinion the health interests of the District, and indeed the health interests of the Nation, are concerned in this legislation. He said:

"Even without reference to a woman's own condition and the maintenance of her own physical, mental, and emotional health, we must bear in mind the fact that when she married and when she bears and rears children for the coming generation, if she has been properly trained and has adequate opportunities to care for herself, we shall be able to maintain the integrity of the race, we shall be able as a Nation to meet the perils that confront us in the future as we are meeting the perils that confront us at the present time, and otherwise we shall fail. We have heard a great deal to-day with respect to the need of the individual woman, but we must go beyond that need and must face the fact that we are acting for the race; we are acting for the Nation.

"The committee concurs heartily in the opinion of this health expert that inadequacy of wages means either of two things, that is, inadequacy of all the essentials—shelter, clothing, food, etc.—'with resultant impoverishment of health'; or, on the other hand, 'it means that from some source the wage must be supplemented with possible resort to wrongdoing.' And the committee further agrees with Dr. Woodward when he says:

"I am very loath, however, to connect up minimum wages with moral questions. The most I care to say there is that when one is tempted the lack of physical stamina and the necessity for maintaining life increase the weight of the inducement, certainly make yielding easier."

Mr. Chairman, we are engaged in the most stupendous war the world has ever seen. To make the world "safe for democracy" will require an enormous wastage of human life and human vitality in this generation, and will leave burdens that will require the most vigorous and efficient kind of men and women in the next generation. We have passed laws for the conservation of natural resources, of mineral wealth, of trees and forests, and water resources; we are agitating daily for the conservation of food. This bill is a step toward the conservation of humanity, and I submit that it is more important to conserve the boys who will be the men of to-morrow and the women who will be the mothers of the men of to-morrow.

Mr. Chairman, I think I have one minute remaining.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; the gentleman has one minute.

Mr. HILLIARD. I take from what the gentleman from Wisconsin says that they have no further requests. We have one more over here, and I should like to have an agreement that general debate be deemed to be closed at the close of Mr. CROSSER's speech.

Mr. CANNON. He might say something—let us hear his speech and then the gentleman can put his request.

Mr. HILLIARD. I take it that the gentleman objects.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILLIARD. I will.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman from Colorado, who prepared the report, expect to give any views upon the measure at all?

Mr HILLIARD. Of course, Mr. Chairman, I could enlighten the House, but why? We have had good speeches.

Mr. WALSH. We have had some mighty good speeches, but we have not had speeches on several phases of this legislation which have not been touched upon at all.

Mr. HILLIARD. That may be taken up under the five-minute rule. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has 15 minutes remaining.

Mr. HILLIARD. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CROSSER].

Mr. CROSSER. Mr. Chairman, as a member of the committee I voted for a report of this measure, and while I am not as hopeful as many of the supporters of the bill that it will bring about just conditions of employment, nevertheless I am thoroughly in favor of the measure and hope to see it pass without any serious opposition. I do not believe you can pull yourself up by your boot straps. This measure proposes to authorize a commission to fix a definite standard of wages for certain kinds of employment. That is very necessary at the present time. Until the people determine upon some fundamental measure which will destroy monopoly of the natural resources, which will compel the use of valuable land, resort will be made to palliatives which will at least distribute the burden of injustice more equitably among those who must bear it. We must, however, go deeper to find the real cause of injustice to employees whose protection is sought in this bill.

The more that valuable land suitable for building or factory purposes is held out of use or poorly used the higher will be the rent which must be paid for that which is used. This means that a greater portion of the product will be taken for rent and a lesser portion for wages and for interest upon capital invested. We should encourage building and improvements of every kind. This would increase production, and hence labor would benefit.

If, however, we allow the land monopolist to constantly increase the amount he demands as rent, merely because he or some predecessor in title has held title and allowed others about him to improve the land, and because population has increased in the vicinity of the land unused or poorly used, the man who applies his labor and the man who uses his capital in the production of something upon land must get less. We should encourage labor and encourage capital by ceasing to tax their products, by ceasing to tax the improvements they put upon the land, and we should also discourage men from holding land out of use or from making only partial use of it by taxing them as much on the value of their land as we tax the man adjacent to him who has put improvements upon his land and has therefore also helped the community. This plan would force men to improve their land, would increase the number of factories, business places, and buildings and consequently increase the demand for labor, and an increased demand for labor—like an increased demand for anything else—means an increased price or wage for it.

To fix wages arbitrarily, however, gives no permanent relief. If men in one trade succeed by joint action in raising their wages 20 per cent, for example, the employer simply adds that to the price of his product, and as men in other trades must buy such products it is only a question of time until a corresponding raise is made in other lines of employment, and hence the prices of all products are raised, and so the employees find themselves in the same relative position of disadvantage as before. If, however, the immense holdings of valuable land held idle were forced into use by the taxing power then employers would begin to compete for the services of the employee, and that would naturally force wages up.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CROSSER. Yes.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. How are you going to sell the product of this labor if you raise the cost of producing it above the average cost of producing that same product?

Mr. CROSSER. That is the point I am making.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The labor would, therefore, go out of employment entirely. The result will be, if you do not level up the wage paid to labor similarly employed——

Mr. CROSSER. They would not be able to buy.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. They would not be able to sell the product at all, and would not be able, therefore, to employ the labor at all.

Mr. CROSSER. That is the point I make. While, as I say, we have these conditions confronting humanity generally, while labor is constantly confronted by this unfair condition of things, I do not believe you can permanently remedy the evil; you can not procure justice for the worker by arbitrarily increasing the wage unless you also abolish monopoly of land and the natural resources.

Mr. KEATING. Will the gentleman yield there for just a suggestion?

Mr. CROSSER. Yes.

Mr. KEATING. The suggestion, I think, is made that if you increase wages you must necessarily increase the cost of the product of labor. Will the gentleman agree that that does not necessarily occur, and that if you give a girl sufficient wages to enable her to buy three square meals a day you will possibly render her so much more efficient than she has been and you will really reduce the cost of living?

Mr. CROSSER. The gentleman anticipated me a little. I was coming to that. The point I make is this, that it is certainly a sound principle that you can not increase the cost, no matter who is being hurt or being helped, without being forced to procure a higher price for what you sell, except to the extent that the efficiency of labor is increased, and that means that the worker is doing more work for more wages. It is true that if they are working under better conditions, they may produce more. But suppose you have reached the point where, as you suggest, they are getting three square meals a day——

Mr. KEATING. The minimum-wage law would not apply to any but the very worst conditions. The minimum-wage law would only reach the "submerged tenth" of society.

Mr. CROSSER. I think it ought to reach a great many classes of people, and I am in favor of having it, for reasons that I will give you in a moment. I believe that while we are fighting the battle for ultimate justice, for fundamental justice, an unmonopolized earth and natural resources, I believe that while we are fighting to win that battle we must have the industrial army as fit as possible to carry on that fight against special privilege for real justice. Everything that can be done to give them strength and courage for the great and final struggle must be done. For that reason I am heartily in favor of this measure, although I feel that it will only partially relieve the injustice and suffering.

I know that the gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON] would not agree with me entirely on that proposition.

Mr. LONDON. Will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. CROSSER. Yes; in just a moment.

I believe that if you can make it to the advantage of every individual to make the best possible use of the earth you will make a demand for labor, because you bring into use the natural resources of the earth, a great many of which are now kept out of use for the reason that it is now more to the advantage of the man who monopolizes them to keep them out of use. If you do that, it means that you increase the demand for labor, and that means an increased price for labor, like anything else, and I do not think it would be long before the wage question would settle itself satisfactorily.

Mr. LONDON. When the gentleman uses the phrase "natural law" does he mean a physical law, unchangeable by the action of men?

Mr. CROSSER. I mean the laws of economics, sociology, and psychology.

Mr. LONDON. Are they unchangeable?

Mr. CROSSER. What I am talking about is human nature.

Mr. LONDON. You are coming down to human nature, and you are assuming that nature has not changed and we are the same savages we were a million years ago.

Mr. CROSSER. Well, I do not believe that the gentleman will dispute that the average man naturally tries to satisfy his desires with the least exertion necessary. If there has been some new element of human nature developed contrary to that I have not discovered it. I do not say that ultimately we will not reach that altruistic state of society when men will first think of others and see that justice is done them before satisfying their own desires. I surely would welcome such a state. But I say that the great majority of men do not follow that course to-day.

As I have already stated, however, we must accept every remedy which can be had and which will help at all to put men in a more independent position and will give them strength and courage to make the fight for real fundamental justice. If we do not see to it that they get a decent wage, a wage more than merely enough to keep body and soul together, and which will free them from constant worry and anxiety, unless we establish such conditions the victory for real justice will be long postponed. For that reason I earnestly urge the passage of this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILLIARD. I yield one minute to the gentleman for that purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for one minute more.

Mr. CROSSER. Yes; I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. What does the gentleman say to the time-honored law of economics, that the values represented by money as a medium of exchange can not be arbitrarily fixed by statute? If you agree to-day to pay a man $3 because $3 is the token of corresponding value to-day, it may happen that within a year the $3 will in purchasing power be equal to $6. Then what have you done by your statute?

Mr. CROSSER. I have already explained that values are more or less relative under the present system.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. How are you going to rearrange prices in accordance with that?

Mr. KEATING. The board has the right to readjust these wages.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Then the Congress becomes a body to pass economic laws, instead of statutes, by putting monkey wrenches in the wheels.

Mr. KEATING. There are no "wheels" in this bill.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I have a strong suspicion of it.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CROSSER. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. I wanted to ask the gentleman to state whether, if he did not think this statute will bring a millenium, he has anything in his mind that he thinks will?

Mr. CROSSER. I have already suggested a remedy which would at least carry us in that direction.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 12098) to protect the lives and health and morals of women and minor workers in the District of Columbia, and to establish a minimum-wage board and define its powers and duties, and to provide for the fixing of minimum wages for such workers, and for other purposes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is it in order to offer an amendment to the title, or should we wait until the first section is read?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I suggest that the title should be amended after the bill is completed.

The CHAIRMAN. It can be amended after the bill is passed. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That where used in this act—
The term "board" means the minimum-wage board created by section 2.
The term "commissioners" means the Commissioners of the District of Columbia.
The term "woman" includes only a woman of 18 years of age or over.
The term "minor" means a person of either sex under the age of 18 years.
The term "occupation" includes a business, industry, trade, or branch thereof.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment at the end of line 4, to strike out the period and insert a comma and the words "but shall not include domestic servants."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LONGWORTH: Page 2, line 4, after the word "thereof," strike out the period and insert a comma and the words "but shall not include domestic servants."
